In 1896 Sanderson met Charles E Goodrich, already well-known as a professional photographer working under Palmer Clarke in the old-established studios in Post Office Terrace. Together they managed the studio with Goodrich devoting his attention to the portrait side of the business.

Between them they enhanced the reputation of the firm and photographed many thousand folk including country vicars and university professors. Goodrich used to write to famous people to offer free sittings - including the Master of Trinity J.J. Thompson remembered as looking just like a tramp shuffling by but who would stop and look in window on the way. Other sitters were Lord Rutherford - Goodrich said he looked like a farmer - very nervous of the camera and difficult to photograph, Sir Arthur Quiller Couch, F.R. Leavis, Donald McClean - remembered as a very smart, handsome young man but later unmasked as a spy - and Arthur Hamilton, the Christ's college man who was chosen as the model for the Cambridgeshire war Memorial at the end of Station Road

All were shown into the studio where Goodrich used to pull strings and bring white net curtains over the roof to soften the natural light by which he worked. To ensure the sitters remained still for the long exposure their necks would be clamped in a half-moon shaped contraption. Once the negative was taken there would begin a process of developing and retouching - disguising any imperfection in photo or sitter such as spots or moles.

The negatives were filed - 50,000 are now catalogued and indexed in the Cambridgeshire Collection - but the firm cannibalised older glass negatives washing off the original image and then cutting them to a smaller size to fit their own cameras before recoating and reusing them

But Goodrich's real love was colour photography and since there was no colour film this involved painting over faint black-and-white prints - a technique which he devised himself and used with great effect in portrait and landscape works. His skill was much admired both then and now

The firm continued to trade successfully until the death of Mr Sanderson in 1929 but then went downhill. When ill health finally overtook him Goodrich sold up to two young women photographers, Lettice Ramsey & Helen Muspratt -and the rest is history

New things can be found in a variety of ways, It is now some years since we had a visit from a man researching a television programme about an Indian mathematician. As the Cambridgeshire Collection devotes little attention to the University and its studies I felt it unlikely that we could be of much assistance, but as he explained, much was known already about this side of Srinivasa Ramanujan, who had been persuaded to leave India to share his knowledge with the academics of Trinity College in 1914 and had gone on to revolutionise mathematics in the five years he had been here.

But it was the events of those five years that Christopher Sykes was wanting to elaborate – and which formed part of his documentary “Letters from an Indian clerk” in 1986. Now the story has again been researched and published in a fascinating book entitled “The man who knew infinity: the life of the genius Ramanujan” by Robert Kanigel

The Indian scholar had found Cambridge far different from his native Madras, For one thing the nights were much colder and he described how he slept with his overcoat on, wrapped in a shawl - yet his friend found the bed well-provided with blankets, but nobody had told the brilliant scholar how to pull them back and slip underneath them. Such alien customs were just part of the trauma of life at Trinity college during the Great War when the open cloisters in Neville's Court were turned into a hospital, with wooden boards laid on the stone floors to keep the beds level, whilst lights strung from the ceiling turned the south cloister into an operating theatre. Whilst the college echoed to the moans of the wounded other parts of the town echoed to the tramping of fit young feet as the colleges, now bereft of undergraduates, devoted their buildings not to teaching Latin and Greek but bombing and shelling, becoming training grounds for Officer Cadets.

The fear of air raids meant roads were blocked to prevent the approach of motors which might pinpoint the town to passing Zeppelins, whilst street lights were extinguished and meals taken by the light of candles. Yet the repartee of High Table, enhanced by visiting officers and scholars was not for Ramanujan whose religion prohibited the consumption of meat and various other items of food, including eggs, onions or tomatoes. So in his tiny alcove he would prepare a meal of rice, yogurt, fruits, rasam and sambhar, a thick spicy, potato-laced vegetable stew - when of course such ingredients were available in a Cambridge gripped in food rationing.

Much of the domestic suffering seems to be echoed in R, Douglas Brown's latest book, "East Anglia 1944" is the penultimate volume in a series charting the local impact of the Second World War. Based largely on newspaper accounts, which were censored during the war, it records many of the events - such as the planning for D-Day (though without mentioning the meetings in Cambridge) and although the Soham ammunition train explosion is accorded appropriate space and put into context amongst other such incidents which were occurring elsewhere there is no mention that the US servicemen sent to repair the track and restore the essential bomb supplies had to be diverted from the dedication of the Madingley Military Cemetery. Or that this was accorded such publicity on the day that the first landings were to have taken place — pure coincidence, or part of the programme of disinformation to keep enemy eyes on Cambridge whilst troops were in fact massing on the South Coast?

IN AUGUST 1742, at Royston, workmen were erecting a bench in the Mercat House for the women who sold their wares in the cheese and butter market.

As they were putting up a post they discovered a hole in the ground about 16ft deep. Examination revealed what seemed to be steps leading down into the gloom, and a boy was sent into it. Then a thin man followed with lighted candle.

By now the word had spread and people flocked to what they were sure would be a hoard of hidden treasure. The chamber was filled with earth and rubbish which they set about removing, raising 200 loads of soil. Antiquarians were soon on the scene to witness not "som very Grate Trashur" but only a "Scull and some Hewman bones ... som think it was for a place of Worship in the Earliest times of Chrestyanaty . . . but all think it a Grate Curiosity".

A great curiosity it has remained, especially when it was found to be covered with religious figures and symbols. Sylvia Beamon, an archaeologist and chairman of the Cambridgeshire Local History Council, has become an established expert in underground structures, investigating tunnels, ice-houses and caves around the world.

For 25 years she has researched her home-town cavern and has now published the results in The Royston Cave, used by Saints or Sinners? In over 300 pages she explores similarities with other carving and graffiti in Britain and Europe, including the Holy Sepulchre Church in Jerusalem, and traces the background to the Knights' Templar and their connection with the area — including Duxford, Waterbeach and Wilbraham. Local families such as the De Veres and Mandevilles are also researched in her most comprehensive and well-illustrated history.

Sadly, the cave itself is suffering rapid deterioration and soon all that may be left is a man-made hole in the ground, with the carvings gone. Sylvia's book must ensure that this never happens and that the mystery will survive for centuries to come.

When Sarah Gordon chose Robinson Crusoe Island as the site for her painting expedition one foggy morning, the result was not a picture of Fen Causeway Bridge but the discovery of the body of a murdered undergraduate.

Elena Weaver had left her college that morning for her usual jog along King's Parade, down Mill Lane and across Coe Fen, but this time she was not to complete it. Who killed her and why are questions that involve Cambridge police in an investigation which takes them into the rarefied world of the university.

All is revealed in For the sake of Elena by Elizabeth George, which introduces St Stephen's College — situated between Trinity and Trinity Hall. St Stephen's may not actually exist but Matthews Hall, Lehman Hall and Radcliffe College certainly do — in Cambridge, Massachusetts.

We were pleased to acquire a photographic guide to our namesake, from the collection of a Cambridge alderman who was presented with it on a visit nearly 30 years ago.

The photographs reveal that the American Cambridge's architecture cannot match the splendour of ours, but several of its buildings might transfer to our side of the Atlantic with ease.

A clutch of publications seem to glory in the surrounding open spaces - Walks in East Cambridgeshire or on the Harcamlow Way, Cycle routes round the fens. Random Ramblings by Richard Spendlove, "They led the way" by Michael Wadsworth and the Cambridge Green Belt Local Plan.

The Green Belt plan is the latest result of years of discussion and debate, going back to the 1950s when restrictions were imposed on manufacturing industries around Cambridge so as to protect what Prof Holford called the "only true University town" left in England. This new report defines the policies now in place to preserve the local environment - restrictions on development or on mineral extraction together with plans to allow historic buildings or large country houses now no longer required for their original purpose to find a new role. Some of the proposals give suggestions for the creation of new footpaths or bridleways, such as opening up a disused railway line from Fen Ditton to Anglesey Abbey to provide both walkers and cyclers with a new route into the countryside, away from congested roads.

The Ramblers Association have been doing precisely that for a number of years and numerous readers have come into the Cambridgeshire Collection to enquire about "The Harcamlow Way" that they find mentioned on maps. They believe this to be an ancient route but in fact it was created only in 1980 to link Cambridge and Harlow by a figure-of-eight walk, mainly using tracks and green lanes. In 1989 a second edition of the 53-page guide was issued but only spotted by us within the last week, though the original copy has been in stock some years.

We are however more up-to-date with "Walks in East Cambridgeshire", a descriptive and illustrated guide to 30 paths ranging from 1.5 to 17 miles just published by the Cambridge group of the Ramblers Association. Clear maps illustrate each route covering parishes from Mepal to Kirtling. Thus from the fens near Prick willow to the wooded countryside around Ashley walkers can wander without getting lost.

For those who prefer two wheels to two feet the County Council have issued a guide to cycle routes around the fens with suggestions based on Ely, March and Wisbech, opening up such delights as Wardy Hill, Black Bank, Prickwillow and Jew House Drove to intrepid explorers.

Richard Spendlove, the BBC Radio Cambridgeshire presenter is also given to Random Ramblings, - the title of one of two cassettes of his poems, largely suggested by listeners comments on his late-night programmes. His "Lady of the evening" features on "Further Ramblings" as does the policewoman who fined him for driving over St Ives bridge - and then phoned in to his programme. Other themes include Soap operas, the car in which he did his courting and his first home - so popular that it is included on both tapes. Not all the subjects are complimentary however - Judges are castigated for "foolishly misadministering the law", Cambridge planners for making motorists persona not grata in the town and the military authorities for sending 17-year olds to the Gulf War - "a disgrace to the point of obscenity".

The exploits of some of the young men who did go to war is told in "They led the way", the story of Pathfinder Squadron 156, who guided planes on raids to Berlin, the Rhur and Hamburg from various local bases. Its author is now Vicar of Haddenham and the publisher, Highgate, uses as its logo a representation of a farm gate - very similar at first sight to a postcard view of Linton we have recently been given. This shows a "clapper-stile" which is cleverly hinged to allow walkers to pass relatively unhindered -just one of the many unexpected delights to be discovered in the Cambridgeshire countryside.

Thousands of people have passed some of their time at Cambridge; many have gone on to great things and have written their memories - or friends have written memoirs of them. Only comparatively few find their way into the Cambridgeshire Collection but a few weeks ago we were given the opportunity to select items from the library of a late Cambridge Alderman and then yesterday a new volume arrived in the post.

Scanning the volumes prior to cataloguing the eye alights on one or two unexpected items - such as the compliments slip from the Editor of the Cambridge Daily News included in "Not only a Dean" — the reminiscences of D.H.S. Cranage published in 1951. Cranage could trace his ancestors back to the twelfth century and was to make his own reputation within the University Extension Lectures department, travelling the country - sometimes in appalling conditions — railways carriages being unheated except by the occasional foot warmers, whilst on one occasion at Grantham the lecture hall was a corrugated-iron hall, the temperature little above freezing and his students wore fur rugs to keep warm. His book covers the opening of Stuart House once the new Board of Extra-Mural Studies had been established in 1925. In 1927 he arrived home from an American tour to find his servant had sorted his letters into those requiring attention and a pile of circulars he didn't need to be troubled with. Idly glancing at the circulars before bedtime he spotted one had the word "Prime Minister" at the bottom - it was an invitation to accept nomination for the post of Dean of Norwich!,

It was in 1927 that a friend produced a memoir of George Leigh Mallory, the mountaineer who perished on Everest on his fifth attempt on the summit three years earlier. Mallory had spent his undergraduate days at Magdalene college where he developed a passion for rowing and swimming. One hot night he insisted on diving from a punt below Magdalene Bridge but then refused to climb back in. His friends punted off, anxious to be back at their college before the gates closed at 10 o'clock but Mallory elected to swim home and enter via the Fellow's Garden. Sadly the doors were already locked and in desperation, and stark naked, he swam to Quayside and sprinted, dripping, across the bridge to the main Gate. But before the Porter could open he was spotted by a Policeman. How Mallory soothed the constable's outraged sensibilities at such a show of nakedness and persuaded him to see the humour of the situation will never be known.

Both rowing and education form part of the most recent accession, "To independence and beyond" is the memoir of a Colonial and Commonwealth civil servant who studied at Trinity but then went to teach in Northern Rhodesia, progressing to the Ministry of Education in Lusaka and playing a major part in the integration of African and non-African educational systems. Later he joined the Commonwealth Secretariat and undertook several special assignments for the Secretary-General. All this makes the book most interesting reading but there is another, special side to the story. The author, Peter Snelson devotes a chapter to his schooldays at the Cambridge & County High School for Boys under Headmaster Arthur Mayne - known to his pupils as "Tish". This was wartime with air-aid shelters dug across the playgrounds to which they would rush when the sirens sounded - though at home in Victoria Road they now largely disregarded the regular warnings. His father, Briscoe Snelson, was manager at Norman Bradley's pawnshop opposite St John's College where suits, worn on Sundays were pawned on Monday to be reclaimed once pay-day came. But Briscoe is better remembered for his involvement in the local rowing scene - as administrator, not rower, following a horrendous wound in the Great War and of course for his photography of fen and river scenes. Now Peter has completed his own memoirs of an active life there are plans to spend time selecting and sorting some of the photographs now in the Cambridgeshire Collection to produce a volume of pictures of the Cam & Ouse as a tribute to his father

Some weeks seem harder than others: sometimes we get a day when nothing goes straightforwardly & no matter how many books or pictures we have catalogued the reader will always need something that is either still going through the system, or is particularly difficult to answer.

Then there will be weeks which for some reason have gone mad - giving the same talk three times in five days - the 1947 fen floods at Newmarket on the Tuesday, Heritage Showcase on the Wednesday and Burwell on Friday. Or a mixture of events that come together - hence "Cambridge Photographers 1844-1900" at Netherhall Monday, the Cambridgeshire Local History Society in the Showcase on Tuesday followed next day, same venue by a talk on "Home Front 1939-45". Thank goodness it was the Stretham School Play on Thursday evening and a one-night break before Linton on Saturday on "Cambridgeshire during the Great War.

It was returning from this latter talk that I hit the roadworks at Fen Ditton. These were not especially troublesome but just at the moment there do seem a lot of them. Cherry Hinton High Street being traffic-calmed, Victoria Road one-day, Histon Road one way, Milton Road closed - not to mention the major road resurfacing on the road to Huntingdon & the M11.

Thus speculating on recent accessions it seems appropriate to record "The ride of Hereward the Wake and his mare Swallow, ridden by 'The Skipper' without 'The Boy'". This was a six-page illustrated article which was published in "The Graphic" for September 6th 1890 - something impossible to find except by pure chance. Written by C.T. Staniland it seeks to describe a circular journey from Ely riding on a Humber tricycle. He set off over decent roads via Stuntney to Soham with its "paintable thatched cottages" but then to Worlington the road became awful - mere loose gravel heaps - and on to Mildenhall and Weeting Castle, Newmarket and its cowboys (imitation) Deadwood coach (ditto). Red Indians (ditto).

No Humber could travel the Devils Ditch but the road to Cambridge was little better - bad muddy roads and then taking the wrong turn road through stony, rutted cross roads and heavy rain to Six Mile Bottom. As Staniland continued his journey he found road conditions little improved - the Roman Road with deep cart tracks making even walking irksome, the road around Trumpington sticky after the rain - though the section around Coton was decent and dry - "no broken luggage carrier, no rain, dust- or wind, and a perfectly charming country",

Madingley was buried in trees but the road from Dry Drayton to Lolworth impassable so he diverted to the main Huntingdon road - which, unlike modern motorists, he found quite perfect

So on goes the journey, recording the road reports like some modern radio announcer, via Holywell - "the back of the world, dilapidated cottages, yellow-grey mud-walls were dropping in flakes from their framing, the thatches were rotting and peeling away from the rafters, mud and mildew, damp and dreariness, rust and rottenness seem to have got the upper hand", To St Ives and Earith and then the final stretch along the Causeway to the Isle of Ely at Haddenham over good surface, stones and brickbats, "passing one or two lonely farmhouses in a dreary level waste of fen",

Staniland reminisced about the attempt by William the Conqueror to attack Hereward across such desolate landscapes in the pre-drainage days but even he could not have imagined that route in 1947 when the land was under water to the depth of several feet - but for the moment I've had enough of the floods - if you want any more you must read it yourself and fortunately there are two excellent booklets that will enable you to do just that

It's something I'd always meant to do, but somehow never got around to. Then our Parish Council decided to take up the offer to have the village rephotographed and the pack arrived on my desk. Photocopies of nearly 40 views of the village taken or collected by members of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society some 60 years ago, together with a copy of the Ordnance Survey for 1926 and a modern colour print film. Of course I could have delegated it to another member of the Council - there would have been no shortage of volunteers - but there has to be some perks as Chairman.

All I have to do is identify where the original picture was taken and then take a modern equivalent from the same spot. It helps having my own copies of the pictures already but even the most novice newcomer would surely identify Top Street. True the pub sign has now gone, as have the buildings in the background on the left-hand side - and we now have street lights - and pavements. Did I ought to wait until all the cars which now line the street have disappeared, or arrange for four young ladies to stand where their great-grandmothers did. What about the lighting - what time of day did the original postcard photographer visit - and when was it anyway?

Another picture is captioned "Cambridge Road" - but it's Wilburton Road, then we have "Main Street" - that's High Street, and "Ely Road" - that's High Street too, whilst "Hall Corner" - well that was of course the Mission Hall - the black building on the left - whilst the pond was filled in and is now the Jubilee Garden on the Newmarket Road - but which the map calls "Military Road" and the photographer "Dimmock's Cote Road" when he snapped the Malt and Hops Inn - no longer an inn, or thatched and the old barn next door has long since gone ...

Another picture was taken in 1928 in Chapel Lane. The old thatched houses have now disappeared, though a bit of the wall remains, as does the corrugated sheeting and the posts which block the lane to traffic -although they have now moved further East. But its sneaky of him to have taken pictures of the back of the cottages ... What of picture 14 - the cottages in Reads Street that had running water - everytime it rained the water ran through the roof. They were burned down when a spark from a bonfire in the garden of the big house across the street caught the thatch and the bungalow was built to replace it ...

And so we progress the village, locating angles, dodging showers, waiting for the sun to come from behind the cloud, and noticing how far the old churchyard wall used to jut out into the street, how the cottage at Plantation Gate has lost one of its dormer windows but kept the self-same telegraph pole outside it, how the windmill used to be visible from one side of the village to the other and how the farmer has replaced the old walnut tree that used to stand outside the farmhouse which has itself now gone.

Across the county other villagers are undertaking similar surveys on behalf of the Cambridgeshire Local History Society. They have paid their £10 registration fee and received their starter pack of pictures and map. They too are walking streets and seeing sights with a new eye, are talking to house owners amazed to see their property was once so different - and to learn that they can obtain copies of the old pictures. It really is a piece of Detective work with notes to be written up so that both old and new pictures, lodged in the Cambridgeshire Collection, can be recorded for benefit, of future historians. It is fiendishly difficult, frustrating and fascinating - and if anybody can identify picture 9 1 should be most grateful!

Contact Gillian Rushworth of the Cambridgeshire Local History Society Photographic Group care of the Cambridgeshire Collection. The registration fee includes a years membership of the Society which organises lectures and excursions and publishes a Journal, The Cambridge Antiquarian Society's photographic survey is deposited in the Cambridgeshire Collection alongside our other 400,000 pictures

Local government is once more undergoing reorganisation with the various Councils formulating their own proposals as to the best means of progression into the twenty-first century, One area of responsibility they are unlikely to find devolved upon them is that of Education, since current thoughts seem to revolve around the removal of this high-spending area of service from local to national government

Yet just 40 years ago the Isle of Ely County Council was undertaking a dramatic programme of school building and expansion, an indication of which has become particularly apparent through the recent accessioning of a series of programmes of official openings. These also underline the work of Councillors and Aldermen such as J.W. Payne who as Chairman of the Education Committee found himself presiding at a series of such events.

Thus in May 1953 he was introducing the local M.P., Major (later Sir Harry) Legge-Bourke at St Audrey's county primary infant school, Ely, Newly constructed under the Isle's Development Plan for primary and secondary education following the 1944 Education Act, the building had been planned to be airy, well designed and spacious, a place of which the children could be proud and where they would find beauty, dignity and order. Pre-stressed concrete beams saved 94% of the steel normally used - responding to Government pressure for the greatest economy in the use of steel in buildings. There was central heating, artificial lighting by electricity, a plug and socket in every classroom as well as that most important and modern innovation, a socket for a wireless loudspeaker. Each class was designed to accommodate 40 children.

The formula for both school and opening ceremony was repeated the following month at Burnsfield School, Chatteris with another Infants School at Wisbech following in October 1954 - this boasting the country's first electric control unit in the kitchen - whilst one year later Payne was again officiating at an official opening, this time at Westwood county junior school March, catering for children from seven to eleven years.

But the Isle was conscious of the new need for every child over 11 to have education without cost to the parents with the opening just two weeks earlier of the Sir Harry Smith secondary school at Whittlesey. In this brickmaking area of the county boys and girls were to be trained for employment in industry and commerce with a special book-keeping room as well as provision for needlework, although a school garden and ample provision for instruction in animal husbandry was incorporated. By now technology had developed and the omnipresent loudspeaker point now had an individual volume control with a central radio in the secretary's office incorporating a microphone.

Children with especial learning difficulties claimed Alderman Payne's particular attention a year later with the conversion of the Manor House at Wilburton - originally designed in 1851 by Pugin, the architect responsible for the interior redecoration of the House of Commons, Few places could offer a more delightful, healthy and unspoilt environment for either day or boarding pupils with particular care given to safety - with fire fighting apparatus supplemented by a deep well and large pond, and each member of staff supplied with a high-powered hand lamp in case of emergency,

Then in October 1957 Payne was back in Ely, once more introducing a VIP -The Duchess of Gloucester - performing the ceremony at the new High School for Girls on Downham Road. Originally established in 1905 in Bedford House it provided Grammar School education not only for the Isle but also for northern parts of Cambridgeshire - an example of local councillors working together for the benefit of their residents,

After a number of years absence the Cambridgeshire Local History Society has revived its annual publication. The new "Review" covers a variety of diverse topics, as well as news and notes about the Group and its activities .

Tom Doig, formerly Curator of the Cambridge Folk Museum, has contributed a most interesting study of a largely untold aspect of local life - bare-knuckle boxing. He examines a contest between Owen Smith and "Brighton Bill" (William Phelps) which took place on Melbourn Heath in March 1838. The site had been carefully chosen to be near the junction of three counties for such contests were illegal and should the event be raided by magistrates from Cambridgeshire it would be a matter of moments for the protagonists and onlookers to step across into Hertfordshire or Essex.

AS at some modern-day "Rave" some three thousand spectators assembled at Noon's Folly to await the pugilists in what was expected to be a bloody contest - for Brighton Bill had already been involved in two previously fatal fights, whilst Swift had killed three of his opponents. Yet both were educated and well-mannered, one had written books and the other had a reputation as an elegant dresser.

In due course the contest commenced and was well matched - at least for the first 60 rounds. Both were knocked down several times and revived by their Seconds, But by round 80 Brighton Bill's face had been severely lacerated, his body and legs terribly mutilated. Nevertheless he fought on for another five rounds, before finally falling senseless after over an hour and a half of fighting. He was picked up and carried off to The Wheatsheaf at Barkway, whilst the crowds dispersed, the pickpockets totalled their takings & the tradesmen counted their profits and planned a rematch

This was not to be for "Brighton Bill" was failing to make a recovery and died three days after the fight. The inquest found his opponent guilty of manslaughter and warrants were issued for the arrest of both boxer and seconds. Doig relates the subsequent search and trial - and tells how still on dark Spring nights the Barkway churchyard and upper rooms of the Wheatsheaf Inn can be heard the ghostly groaning of a beaten boxer

Other articles cover the Land Settlement Association at Fen Drayton where land was made available to unemployed miners and steelworkers during the hardship of the 1930s - and tells the story of musical boxes based on Alan Wyatt's excellent private collection at Landbeach. Also related are the problems of schooldays at Swavesey in 1906 where the lack of such basic facilities as drinking water was not considered too serious since there were two pumps just 250 yards away. Nor were lessons too disrupted by the loud "Tick ...Tock" from the school bell in the belfry outside, interspersed by the rumble and clanking which preceded the clanging strokes on each hour ... just one reminder of past times contained in this most interesting "Review"

Roger Law was born within sight of Ely Cathedral, a member of a Littleport building family who, he claims, did everything at breakneck speed and if there was a corner to be cut they cut it. Working hours were extended as necessary and nothing must be allowed to affect construction. Thus when Uncle Bill, had a heart attack whilst working on a roof he was lowered to ground on a "dodgy" pulley since the good one was being used to bring bricks up.

His childhood days in the fenland town include memories of being forced to watch a snowstorm called "The Coronation" on his grandfather's television set - one of the first in the area - only glimpsing occasionally the features of his new Queen, whose face he was later to know so well.

Law's schooldays were distinguished by his misbehaviour - he was caned regularly until the form master got bored with hitting him - and then at 15 transferred to the Cambridge School of Art where he met the son of a Park Street grocer who had learned lettering though the frequency with which he had to repaint the "L" in the sign over his father's shop. Peter Fluck and Law quickly learned they could earn money by waiting on table for the undergraduates at Trinity College and that University magazines would provide an outlet for their artistic talent - designing the cover for the 1961 May Week issue of "The Cambridge Review". They also staged their own "Anti-Ball" at a house in the "demure village" of Shelford - "the greatest party in Shelford's entire history" - but the police broke it up. It had been intended as a fundraiser for the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, a cause which they had embraced - for with so many US bomber bases in the area what chance would Littleport have of survival in any attack,

The partnership has flourished and developed and the book relates the trials and tribulations leading to the creation of the "Spitting Image" characters, a concept developed in a former Methodist Temperance chapel just around the corner from Law's Cambridge home.

"He could turn politics ... into a kaleidoscope of fun ; pomposity is punctured, lunacy is made sane, sanity lunatic" - not an epitaph for Law but for Christopher Cornford, whose death was announced recently. The son of a Cambridge professor he was a life-long supporter of Left-wing politics, joined the Communist Party and was beaten up by Moseley's Blackshirts. His brother, John, was killed fighting for the republican side in the Spanish Civil war. On his retirement as Professor at the Royal College of Art in 1979 Cornford turned his artistic skills to the support of the Cambridge anti-nuclear and environmental movements. Now a selection of his caricatures and protest drawings have been issued by the Cambridge CND in a booklet which records the development of the peace movement since its revival in the early 1980s, including an account of the anti-cruise missile protest at Molesworth,

So by coincidence we have two books devoted to the work of caricaturists, each with strong Cambridge connections, both involved in the anti-nuclear movement - and both featuring Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher

"A nasty piece of work ; the art and graft of Spitting image" by Roger Law is published by Booth-Clibborn Editions whilst "Drawn to Protest - drawings by Christopher Cornford" is published by Cambridge Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament at £2.95

Two recent accessions have Provided an insight into the role of women at different times, and in different ways, Sue Slack has compiled a selection of stories from the Cambridge Chronicle of 1896 which make a fascinating snapshot of attitudes and activities at that time when the movement to allow women to be awarded degrees was reaching its height - various other Universities having already opened their doors without restrictions - though the Provost of Kings was opposed and Bishop Selwyn expressed his concern "How were they to prevent women being pulled down by contact with the rougher and coarser nature of men. There was a fear women would be degraded, therefore they must be kept on a pedestal", The proposals were rejected

Meanwhile the paper carried advertisements for kitchen maid, governess or as cook at Ely workhouse – wages £24 per year plus rations but no beer. Others were driven to crime - Eliza Watts who stole 2 rabbits worth 2/- from Albert Langford, a fishmonger of East Road claimed her husband had been out of work and she had been unable to procure food, whilst another murdered her illegitimate child with a pair of folding nail scissors, Amongst the deaths recorded was that of Elizabeth Quinn - unable to untie the knot in the laces of her corset she had applied a lighted taper to burn the lace but set fire to her clothes and died of burns.

Lady Cromwell, grandmother of Oliver, however died after being bewitched by Alice Samuel - the same old lady whose very presence caused the children of Robert Throckmorton to fall into fits - which ailments became more pronounced whenever there was an audience to watch the girls behaviour. The Primitive medicine of the 1590s could detect no other cause for the girls actions and surely Alice did look just like a witch was supposed to look like with her wrinkled face, hairy lip and squeaking voice. Scholars came from Cambridge to question the Warboys woman who was brought from her house to live with the Throckmortons, for only then would the fits subside. The agony of the elderly lady and of her husband and daughter can be glimpsed in the pages of Moira Tatem's account of "The witches of Warboys" as one by one the family were accused and forced to describe the imps the children said they could see. After years of such accusations even Alice could find no other explanation and saw no reason to defend the husband who had maltreated her, though steadfastly denying that her own daughter had any involvement with the Throckmorton girls' rantings. All three were hanged at Huntingdon in April 1563 and an account of the trial published shortly afterwards by the Judge who sentenced them to death and who also took pains to ensure that no alternative pamphlets were issued.

The story of the Warboys witches is now presented with extracts from the 1593 account and with a reasoned commentary on what one author described in 1795 as "The insanity and mischief of vulgar superstitions", Moira Tatem also draws comparisons with the recent Orkney child abuse case and the readiness of normally decent people to pronounce guilt without a shred of evidence.

THE ANNIVERSARY of the 1953 Coronation will have many people seeking out their souvenirs, and copies of programmes are regular additions to the Collection.

The Cambridge Coronation Committee, under the chairmanship of Alderman Capt A C Taylor, and representatives of the WVS, Rotary Club and Chamber of Commerce put together a fun-packed time.

Sub-committees were appointed to discuss sports, variety entertainment, teas for elderly and blind people, fireworks and decorated vehicles, and the Cambridge Daily News offered a prize of £100 for the best decorated private house.

Sunday, May 31 saw a United Services and British Legion service on Parker's Piece, where the bands of RAF Oakington and Upwood were joined by the Cambridge Sea Cadets, Cambridgeshire Regiment, British Legion and Salvation Army and Chatteris Town Silver Prize bands.

Over 2,500 people assembled, standards flying, in front of Hobbs Pavilion.

Monday saw the opening of a cricket match between Cambridge University and Cambridgeshire county clubs but it was Coronation Day itself, June 2, that was to be the main day on which the sun needed to shine.

At 9 am disabled people in the Guildhall and Corn Exchange were able to watch the televised ceremony on sets supplied by University Cameras or Messrs J Ward of East Road, the former installing a giant 4ft screen using specialised receivers working much like a cinema. On Jesus Green from 11 am there would be a demonstration of flying by the Cambridge Model Aircraft Club, followed in the afternoon by children's sports, fancy dress, six-a-side football and trick riding by the Cambridge Centaur Motor Cycle club.

Elsewhere Joan Metcalfe would stage a grand variety concert, the parade of decorated vehicles would be judged on Midsummer Common and the Astrals All Star Dance Band would perform on Christ's Pieces.

Plans must, however, be subject to the whims of the weather and cold blustery winds and heavy showers of almost wintry ferocity did their best to disrupt proceedings. They flapped the flags that flew in every main road and back street, including an American Stars and Stripes

Later in the afternoon conditions moderated somewhat and people began to venture from indoors, celebrating briefly and then dashing for shelter under trees.

The decorated vehicle parade comprised just two people and one vehicle. The fire brigade demonstration was cancelled, and dancing transferred to the Guildhall. Pubs, with licences extended to midnight, and the various cinemas did good trade.

Despite the weather people made it a day to remember and even the fireworks display managed to fizz among the drizzle.

Perhaps it was the weather that seems to have resulted in a surprising shortage of photographs.

Any other pictures, or memories, of Coronation Day would be welcome to add to the Collection

Items arrive in the Collection in various ways. Many we seek out by reading newspaper reviews, checking bibliographies, browsing through bookshops or just keeping an eye open. Readers will often bring in an odd pamphlet, perhaps some postcards they have found whilst clearing out, or a number of negatives discovered in an attic.

Occasionally we will be invited to cast an eye over a collection of material prior to it being sold through the book trade, when we both select items to buy for ourselves and also point out things which have an especial value or rarity.

Thus at 8pm one evening last week, having completed my part of a radio programme on the 1953 Coronation a little earlier than anticipated, I made my way to a flat in the East of the city to see the result of one man's enthusiasm over the last few years. To my amazement I was shown into a room overflowing with books and for the next one and a quarter hours pile after pile was placed in front of me,

Almost all of the titles I recognised, but did we have this particular edition and is the volume in better condition than the one we have filed - and which has been used - for so many years. By the time I left I had selected several dozen items to be checked against our own stock. It gives an opportunity to look again at familiar titles unread for years

"Cambridge from within" by Charles Tennyson was issued in 1913 and is an undergraduate's musings with little to commend it apart from the illustrations and his description of the streets "compact of shops and lodgings; tailors, hosiers, tobacconists, bootmakers, set their flagrant snares for youth in every alley" whilst through them clank "the two tiny creeping horse trams ... incongruous as reindeer sledges"

An alternative view is that contained in "Overture to Cambridge", a novel issued in 1936 by Joseph Gordon MacLeod which starts by publishing a formal declaration that the characters depicted have no connection with any living people and then goes on to satirise both traders and councillors. It is based around a Cambridge Mayor, don of St Peter's college, whose wife is killed in a car smash in Sidney Street. Newspaper sellers prospered, people stopped talking and even policemen on point duty asked for details.

Another record of police work is contained in a slim volume that I know we do not have. "Cam Courier" was produced for members of the borough force in 1945 to provide news for & of men then serving abroad. It is full of humour and in-jokes, poems and puzzles. One such appeared in the July issue and is well be worth repeating. It takes the form of an extract from a statement; "... and there was I standing in the middle of the road facing towards the town. that, is towards Market Hill. There was a Church on my right and a College on my left. I have beers staying in Cambridge for only a few days and don't know my way about , , ,", Where was he? Answer next week

Whereas I can probably still remember most of the books we hold in the Collection other items provide more of a challenge. Thus amongst the material borrowed last week were a number of maps.

"Crutchley's county map of Cambridge for cyclists and tourists" folds into an attractive cover and once sold for 6d., Although undated it is distinctive and will be easy to check against our holdings, Ordnance Survey sheets I would hope we have complete but have borrowed a copy of the popular edition one-inch map of 1920 which covers the Ely area and a 1913 Quarter-inch to the mile sheet covering East Anglia from coast to Huntingdon just to make sure.

One that will cause some complications is a ½ -inch to the mile map which stretches from London to Nottingham and from Rugby to Stowmarket., On this there is no indication of date so I reproduce a section to seek clues from the information contained. Cambridge stops at Victoria Road, ferries ply at Chesterton and Fen Ditton, the bridge at Clayhithe is a toll, Cherry Hinton a village. Long Road undeveloped and there is a rifle range on Coldham's Common, The scale is so small there is little detail and although Homerton College is marked on the left of Hills Road, St John's church opposite is not named - the answer to the police poser of last week,

Bus timetables are already housed in the Collection but I was excited to acquire a set of fare tables from May 1964 which records the cost of travelling nearly 30 years ago. Prices quoted are of course in shillings and pence which may still be remembered by many but will be incomprehensible to others, Those in the former category might like to pit their wits against the half-penny ready reckoner - well what was 34 half-pennies in shillings ?

Other snippets include Smiths "Light Blue" boat race card for Easter 1906 with its list of crews and advertisements for Matthew's of Trinity street who would supply Vintage champagne at 71/- ((£3,55) per dozen bottles; twelve permanent photographic views of Cambridge - including Trumpington Street; and the Papworth Victory Annual for 1945-6.

Such items are typical of those we hold in the Cambridgeshire Collection, and indeed may already be there, but we are always grateful for the opportunity to add to our files so that researchers both now and in the future can make use of them

Last week two footnotes were added to the history of a major Cambridgeshire industry, almost completely forgotten. Coprolite — fossilised "Dinosaur dung" was extracted by the Victorians on a massive scale for use as fertiliser and again during the Great War to be made into explosives. Firstly photographs of the giant machinery installed when a quarry at Trumpington was developed on behalf of the Ministry of Munitions in 1918 were discovered by a researcher and then, by coincidence, technical details of the locomotives used on the site and the date on which the plant was auctioned are featured in a book received days later.

"Industrial locomotives of East Anglia" is full of information on a variety of sites including Ely sugar beet factory, Burwell brickworks and cement works at Barrington, Cherry Hinton & Shepreth. Although not a book for general reading it gives details not available elsewhere such as the narrow gauge tramways installed for agriculture in Burnt Fen and for drainage near Littleport.

Such facts appeal to enthusiasts and experts but may leave others unmoved. When the Institution of Mechanical Engineers held a meeting in Cambridge in 1913 they turned their attention to the local area, visiting the Saxon & Norman cement works and the Cambridge Scientific Instrument Company. The most up-to-date methods of draining the fens were also on their agenda with papers reviewing the background to the problems and suggesting technical solutions. Eighty years ago there were still a few windmills driving scoop-wheels, the largest of which was at Harrimere near Ely with its 41 feet sails driving a scoop-wheel 30 feet in diameter. Most of the mechanism was made of wood including the gears which wore themselves into the proper shape. The building, on its brick base, was then about 180 years old, framed in timber and boarded. It had been lived in up to 10 years before by the great-great-grandson of the first occupant. By 1913 it had been superseded by a steam pumping station at Prickwillow. The papers go on to give further technical details of the pumping machinery, its reciprocating beams, high-pressure crossheads and jet-condensers which during the floods of August 1912 had run for 372 hours non-stop, consuming three-and-a-half tons of coal every twelve hours of normal working,

"But what is coal" is one of the questions being asked by the children who visit the last of the mighty steam pumping engines which played such an important part in the drainage of the fens. The Stretham Engine Trust, who have just reopened the beam engine after extensive restoration, have produced two guides which explain something of the complexity of the machinery. One is aimed specifically at children, telling how coal was brought to the engine by river and then barrowed up long planks, over the newly-restored weighbridge and into the yard. From there it was shovelled into the boilers by the stoker who lived in the little cottage beside the engine. Steam provided the power which raised the piston which worked the beam which turned the scoopwheel which lifted 30 tons of water every time it went round. Armed with such a guide even I can understand something of the mechanism and seek out all the oiling points which needed constant lubrication. But there is nothing quite like seeing it in action and this may be possible later in the year if the necessary money can be raised to install an electric drive,

If this happens perhaps the Mechanical Engineers will visit, along with the Industrial Enthusiasts - and of course the children doing their Technology and History projects

Within a week three eminent Cambridge men have been recorded in print - a giant, a giant in the mathematical field and a giant amongst builders.

The giant, is Thomas Hickathrift reputed to have been born in Tilney All Saints in about 1066 who by age 10 had grown 6ft tall and ended up two feet higher than that and weighing 22 stone. In the course of an exciting life he killed the Wisbech ogre - "a naked beast covered in slimy green mud with large bloodshot eyes, twisted brown-stained teeth and a cavernous frothing mouth" who habitually slaughtered passers-by and nailed their skulls to tree trunks alongside the carcasses of their horses, sheep or cattle. Tom also put down a riot at Ely for which he was knighted by King William for whom he later disposed of a monster and its pet dragon. The tale is illustrated by its author, Peter Jeevar and issued by Ketton Publishing as the first in a projected East Anglian Folklore series,

George Green was not honoured during his lifetime but will be commemorated in July when in a bicentennial celebration of his birth a memorial plaque will be unveiled in Westminster Abbey, Now recognised as a mathematician and physicist whose function technique influences modern nuclear physics, quantum electrodynamics and superconductivity he undertook much of his work whilst a miller in Nottinghamshire before coming to Cambridge as an undergraduate in 1833 at the age of 40, Doris Cannell's biography includes details of University life - including examination procedure in the Senate House where before 1801 there were no question papers so as soon as one candidate had answered the first problem he raised his hand and everybody had to break off to write down the next question as it was dictated by the moderator, Green became a Fellow of Caius College - and thus subject, to its rules of celibacy - but returned to Nottinghamshire within two months where he died (possibly of alcoholism) mourned by Jane Smith, his childhood sweetheart, and their seven illegitimate children,

George Kett fathered five children but is best remembered for the building firm that still carries his name. In a truly fascinating account of Kett of Cambridge Anna de Salvo traces a remarkable story full of insights into Victorian life, In 1891 there was uproar when Kett's nomination as Mayor was opposed by the Liberal party demanding the honour be rotated amongst parties (shades of Cambridge 1993) - though there was no opposition in 1898 or 1901. Disputes over the University's jurisdiction over townsfolk and town activities were amongst the contentious issues Kett had to face. Perhaps the most difficult decisions were in connection with the Coronation of King Edward VII who was taken seriously ill just before the Great Day in June 1902. With flags and bunting already up, huge quantities of cakes and other provisions on their way and with the cattle already slaughtered for the proposed dinner to 2,500 old people it was up to Kett to decide whether to proceed or cancel. He chose the latter ordered the bunting taken down and gave the food away. Then when the King recovered the process had to be repeated in September, Well illustrated with photographs and posters this is a fine record of an eminent Victorian and his family,

At first glance it was just an ordinary map, The roads are coloured red, the rivers blue, woods are green. There are the usual details one might expect -the obelisk at Lt Shelford, the old windmill at Stapleford, Pampisford station and Duxford aerodrome. I marked it on the accessions sheet as an Ordnance Survey 1" sheet but now when looking at it in detail for the first time I awake to the fact that the scale is wrong and the map too large - covering the area from Newmarket right across to Wellingborough and from Royston to the outskirts of March.

Even in my initial dozy state I had quickly realised that although the quiet English village names are correct and the map was headed "Cambridge" there was something unusual about it. For the sheet number is shown as "Sonderausgabel 111.41" and underneath is printed "Nur fur den Diestgebrauch!". Had this been written in the Library rather than at home I should have had to check the Reference Library dictionaries. There is less trouble with the symbols for they are printed in two languages - cemeteries are "kirchhof" and battlefields "schlachtfeld".

So here we have a map of England printed in German and dated 1940.. It was sent to the Mayor by Monsieur Denis Martin of Villeneuve les Avignon in France together with a covering letter, sections of which I reprint below

"At the end of the war, in 1944, I was 17 years old. My parents were living in a manor, a few miles east of the town of Le Mars, in west of France. At the beginning of the year the manor was occupied by German troops and my family was authorized to live in an outbuilding of the farm, 3 others manors of the neighbourhood were also occupied. Each morning the German soldiers take a truck and were working all the day in one of these manors. The work was "cartography" ... but I suppose they don't print, at that time, maps of Great Britain but they probably used the other side to print more useful maps, for example of Normandy!

At the beginning of July 1944, because all the allied troops, on the way to Paris, were approaching after victory in Normandy, all these German soldiers withdraw rapidly ... before the arrival of American troops.

The Germans had no time to take all their materials and we found in the manor thousands of maps of different countrys of Great Britain"

M. Martin goes on to relate how the family have used the maps to cover shelves in all the cupboards in the house, with just a few copies kept as souvenirs.

"But, half a century after our liberation by allied troops, and with my sincere gratitude, always deeply and really living, I ask you to accept that small gift"

And so another map finds its way into the Collection - one of hundreds, but few with such an interesting history

Maps remain one of the areas of our stock that are least used, Not the Ordnance Survey sheets, they are consulted regularly, not least a few weeks ago by the farmers completing their set-aside claims, But of the others which date back for over 400 years only a few ever see the light of day,

The exceptions are those of Cambridge itself - the Richard Lyne map of 1574 with its wealth of detail such as the castle on Castle Hill, the line of boats near the Great Bridge, the fisherman near Kings college chapel with the fish he's caught on the bank beside him. This and the Loggan of 1688 and the Custance of 1798 are easy to be expert about, for there is an excellent detailed study by J.W. Clark and Arthur Gray which explains all the details, a few minutes reading and one can really show off,

The county maps however present more difficulties, The Collection hold most of the printed maps produced since 1576 as far as we can judge by consulting the notes compiled by H.6. Fordham which were published in the Proceedings of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society or the list of fen land maps compiled by Clifford Darby and published in the Huntingdonshire Victoria County History volume. "This is a Blaeu, it shows the fens before drainage with the white areas representing the islands sticking up out of the marsh" but ask me to show you something about the cartographer and I will need to refer you to the books in the Reference Library,

Now at least one of the famous names of fenland mapping has received the detailed coverage that his science deserves. Jonas Moore was born in Lancashire of humble origins in 1617 and rose to Knighthood. He established his career as a leading practical mathematician, a making a substantial fortune as cartographer, surveyor, author, teacher, courtier to King Charles II and Surveyor-General of the Ordnance which enabled him in later life to become a patron of the new Royal Observatory at Greenwich.

Amongst his major projects he participated in the great scheme to drain the fens under the Dutch engineer Sir Cornelius Vermuyden. His involvement began in 1649 when he undertook to draw a map of the Bedford Level for £10, which later rose to an annual salary of £200. It was a monumental undertaking which is well detailed in Frances Willmoth's book. There was much opposition from local fenmen, disputes between the drainers - ordering him to be in three places at once - the Civil War, and an inhospitable landscape. Moore took a house at March so that he could be near the work, later moving to Southery where he stayed until the job was completed in 1657.

His final map measured six feet by four and a half and was published in sixteen sheets about 1658. Its scale of two inches to the mile was not to be bettered for 200 years. It served to demonstrate the dramatic changes in the fenland landscape that had been wrought by the drainers and the technical skills of the cartographer. There is a copy in the County Record Office at Shire Hall and we have reprinted our smaller version issued in 1720 which still includes much of the detail of the original - a map hailed by Darby as the finest of the Bedford Level every published,

Pride of place this week has undoubtedly gone to newspapers with the acquisition of a file of the student paper "Varsity" dating back to the 1930s, and an extra set of the "Cambridge Independent Press" between 18 ...). Fortunately this has not involved the wholesale erection of additional shelving since the issues were on microfilm, with whole years papers being compressed into a single 35 mm film, Libraries throughout the country are currently co-operating with the British Library to ensure that files of local newspapers are preserved on film. Cambridgeshire and adjacent counties were surveyed some years ago and a comprehensive report drawn up which details the location of the various titles and gives recommendations for filming. Since then, in common with our neighbours, we have each year set aside a sum of money for this project, supplementing the work that has been under way for over 20 years. Already many hundreds of volumes have been covered including the complete set of the "Cambridge Chronicle" from 1762 to 1934, many years of the "Cambridge Daily-News" since 1888 and - now - most of the "Cambridge Independent Press" from 1815. A couple of days ago another 25 volumes were sent for microfilming, including Cambridge issues from 1933 to 1939 together with a range of titles from other areas of the county.

Once filmed the original newspapers need to be handled much less often, thus reducing the wear and tear though they will continue to self-destruct because of the acidity of the paper on which they are printed. This could be remedied by treating each page or encapsulating it in a thin film, but this would be expensive and with each sheet of paper at least doubling in thickness would increase the storage problems tremendously. Doubtless the future will bring a remedy but for the moment we film, reducing each page to the size of a postage stamp. When placed on a microfilm reader the pages are projected to full size, and extracts can be copied by merely pressing a button on the machine,

Extensive indexing has been undertaken by the Cambridgeshire Collection to try and unlock some of the stories tucked away amongst the thousands of pages issued since the 1770s. Thus, this week, one of our readers was interested in the story behind the names on Little Thetford village war memorial and able to discover quickly how Gunner John Wright had been killed by a shell whilst carrying wounded back to the dressing station, Signaller William Crick wounded by a sniper, Lance-Corporal Charles Newman taken prisoner of war and Sergeant George Dewsbury awarded the Distinguished Conduct Medal. Another researcher from America has been equally interested in Haddenham stories from the nineteenth century.

Yet newspapers contain far more than can ever be indexed in conventional ways. Already many papers such as "The Times" and "The Guardian" are available on compact disc, each capable of storing more than a year's issues which can be searched for specific topics. The future will probably bring methods of scanning old papers onto computers which will then allow any name or subject to be located immediately. Whether or not this will be a good thing is debateable but provided the historic files are available in places such as the Cambridgeshire Collection, it will allow the future researcher the opportunity to appreciate more of our present and past.

John Brown published his autobiography "Sixty years gleanings from life's harvest." in 1858, It is an account of a shoemakers working life in Cambridge, but Brown had also been a soldier, sailor, leather salesman, publican, actor, livery-stable keeper, coal-dealer and billiard-room proprietor as well as a member of the Town Council.

He was born in Barnwell in 1796 and brought up by his grandmother. He learned his shoemaking in London and later, penniless in Kent, enlisted in the army. In 1822 he returned to Cambridge to work as a shoemaker and operate various money-spinning sidelines.

Brown has recently been the subject of a study by Nick Mansfield, curator of the National Museum of Labour History in Manchester, who has put the working-class aspect of Cambridge into context. Shoemaking was one of the many trades which existed to serve the University and which effectively shut down when term finished - or a few days before since tradesmen had to queue to present their accounts to the students for payment. It was a precarious situation as the University had powers to boycott its undergraduates from trading with anybody who offended against their Statutes or their sensibilities - so at election time tradesmen would need to be sure that they declared their vote for the Tory-candidates whilst any who joined a Trade Union or employed such people could find their livelihood ruined.

The economic power of the University was enormous. It owned most of the town and many inhabitants were indirectly employed in service industries or in running the lodging houses where many students lived. Female bedmakers had to be married women - one described as "a charred and wrinkled old piece of womanhood" with a voice "like the grating of a blunt saw". College servants could compensate for their low wages from commissions obtained for introducing their charges to tradespeople and - allegedly - from the removal of any food or drink left after the undergraduates had dined. Such employees were provided by the University with low-rent housing and pensions.

Other women - especially those attracted by the prospect of rich young gentlemen - were treated less well and the University had its own police force with powers to imprison those suspected of prostitution in their private gaol. On the other-hand Undergraduates would frequently accost local women and John Brown had to fight off two students who propositioned his own girlfriend.

Concern for moral welfare led the University to crack down on theatres, circuses or billiard halls like that owned by Brown. He had learned the sport in London and set up his own billiards room using home-made slate tables. He attracted students but also the attention of the Proctors against whom he set up an early warning system with whistles and bells to give the alert and allow the players to escape. By 1850 the University authorities decided their attempts to stop students playing billiards were fruitless and agreed to licence the establishments.

Nick Mansfield's article "Grad and Snobs (the name given to townspeople by-students in the nineteenth century) ; John Brown. Town & Gown in early nineteenth-century Cambridge" just published in "History Workshop Journal" makes most interesting reading, as does the Autobiography itself, the manuscript of which was donated to the Collection by the author

The last week or so have seen the arrival a number of new booklets published about local villages including Haslingfield, Impington, Quy and Thriplow.

Of these "The March of Time" by John W. Flack published by Haslingfield Village Society is the most attractively produced with a series of drawings illustrating many of the memories recounted. John Flack was born in 1316 and shares his memories of naughtiness - how, when pumping the bellows for the church organ he retaliated after one boy had given him a clip around the ears until the sound of the organ descending in a downward drone brought him back to his senses - and back to pumping it up to the correct pressure just as the vicar emerged to see what was causing the disruption to the service. Jack remembers the coming of electricity when Len Huddleston had his own generator and the night of the Kite. About six feet tall and three feet wide it would lift a four pound weight, so they had the idea of fitting a light to it and flying it from the top of Chapel Hill. It took twenty minutes to reach the ideal site, in the middle of a currant field and from there they launched it. The white kite soared away, illuminated by the battery and bulb that they'd tied to it. Suddenly a very bright beam of light of enormous intensity appeared in the night sky, weaving about up and down until it eventually struck the kite, then descended along the binder twine towards the lads on the ground - who panicked and ran home, dumping the damaged kite in a ditch. Next morning it had gone and they never saw it again ...

Fred Gamble's memories of Thriplow in Edwardian Times have been published before but are now reissued by the Thriplow Society. He remembers writing on a slate at school - and getting the cane, smoking Woodbines at five for a penny and keeping track of time by listening for the factory hooters at Shepreth or Whittlesford at morning, midday and when it was time to stop work for the night.

The "Good old days" were not as pleasant as people like to remember, as Peggy Watts shows in her booklet "Peasants to labourers, Quy 1714 to 1830" issued by the Stains Hundred Local History Society. This is a researched account of the community from Squire and Vicar to Widows who eked out a living by spinning, a trade they taught to orphans and fatherless children who could expect little assistance from Parish officials. Meanwhile John Martin who became an MP in 1741 decided that Quy Hall had no sufficiently imposing apartments in which he could receive his constituents so he added two turrets, built a castellated parapet and raised the ceilings of the principal rooms - leaving the ones above only-four feet high!

The principal building in Impington was the Hall, constructed by John Pepys around 1580 and visited by the diarist Samuel. The house had been gutted and redecorated by the time William Cole described it in 1773 as "the best of the sort I ever saw" but when the Pepys family died out it was remodelled again, this time along the lines of Sandringham House. Later it passed to the Chivers Family, and was commandeered by the army during the war when Italian prisoners were housed in Nissen huts in the grounds. It was demolished in 1953. All this is charted in considerable detail by Eleanor Whitehead as part her "Ramble around Impington old village" published by the Histon & Impington village society history group in the latest of their local history booklets

A bundle of newspaper cuttings and a pile of photographs have revealed something of the debate on the provision of nurseries for the pre-school children evacuated from London at the beginning of the war.

Women war workers were urgently needed, women who "would bravely lose their children for a while - if only adequate provision is arranged". The question was what to do with their children. Government hopes that emergency nursery centres would be established in reception areas by the host authorities proved unrealistic and in February 1940 the Nursery Schools Association launched a campaign to train teams of skilled organisers to assist in establishing centres. In 1942 the Government decided to bear the full cost for such provision allowing their establishment in any area - evacuation, neutral or reception. There would be part-time nurseries for children between two and five years to meet the needs of part-time women workers and whole-time nurseries for the care of children of all ages up to five which would be open 12-15 hours a day. This angered the Association who urged that it was the mothers duty to breast-feed their babies for as long as possible rather than dump them in nurseries from as young as three months. They also showed that to cater for children below the age of two would add considerably to the costs of buildings and care.

By 1941 six part-time centres had been established in Cambridge including Homerton college, the Methodist church hall in Norwich Street and St Andrews church hall, Chesterton. Between them they could cater for 167 children and they were already full. In October a group of 35 London firemen visited the Victoria Road nursery - sadly for the children without their fire engine - bringing with them toys made from timber salvaged from bombed houses.

In July 1942 Cambridge's first full-time nursery was established in the grounds of the Sedley school with another at the Shirley school opening in August. Each could accommodate 40 children with qualified matrons and teachers and the costs, apart from meals, was covered by the Government. Despite initial scepticism they were soon full and the Council planned another in Ditton Fields where six mothers were already doing war-work with another twenty-nine willing provided the children could be taken off their hands. This finally opened in July 1943, constructed by Brignells. It was stressed that war work did not just mean munitions and that any mother contributing to the war effort by relieving another woman who was capable of active service could take advantage of the facility.

The importance of such centres was widely recognised & in opening the Ditton Fields nursery Dr C.G.L. Wolf emphasised that "a healthy and happy child is the greatest guarantee we have for the future of any nation".

But at the first meeting of the Cambridge branch of the Nursery School Association in July 1943 Lady Allen of Hurtwood, the movement's leading figure, pointed out that in certain resident nurseries possibly half the children through various reasons had no hope of returning to normal home life. It was the duty of a nursery school prevent the children becoming ill-adjusted, and if they did to cure them. Good nursery schools would teach the children to live harmoniously with their neighbour & were a practical example of how to bring children up wisely and sensibly - & not just in war-time

West Cambridge, West Wrating and Whittlesey come together on our new books shelves, each featuring an in-depth study of a building,

The Schlumberger Research Centre, the tent-like affair on the Madingley Road. is a masterpiece of modern architecture designed by Michael Hopkins & partners and now featured in a large fully-illustrated study published by Phaidon for nearly £20.

It houses one of the world's greatest technological companies which leads the world in the provision of oilfield technical services with a programme of investigation into drilling and fluid mechanics, rock & wellbore physics. The monograph goes into equally technical description of the exoskeletal steel, cable-tensioned, pin-jointed structure with its triangulating tie-rods. It is illustrated with plans, sections & beautiful colour photographs. Positioned on high ground it offers its occupants long views, and doubtless also exposes them to high winds - making the technical achievement all the more remarkable

Windmills however less technically advanced still attract more than their share of attention and Philippa Burrell bought one in 1932. She came upon it by chance having boarded a bus to the highest point in East Anglia - which she decided was West Wrating. Taking lodgings in the village she soon bought the nearby windmill for £600 - including cottage, granary and 20 acres of good farming land of the campaign over Burrell found herself once more in an undecided state. She visited the Public Library and read the literature shelves from end to end. She wrote plays and tore them up. She learned about planting and pruning – and all the while the windmill was watching her with its broken sails, cap all out, windows rotten and rain going in - an unwelcoming part of the property, and one she used to hide in when the bailiffs called. A millwright gave her an estimate of £100 for repair and to raise the money she studied cookery books and made date cakes which she sold from an old pram on Cambridge market, a picture of the mill fixed to the side. It was an immediate sensation and soon she was selling teas to the hundreds of people who journeyed to see the mill, sitting contentedly on rustic tables in the orchard. After two seasons however she closed the business – the mill was restored. It was not the end of the story for she wrote a play "The wind and the mill" which was performed by the Festival Theatre Company in the fields around – England's first Theatre Camp.

These few pages in Burrell's autobiography fill another gap in the history of one of the county's buildings but Samantha Broughton has embarked on a totally different sort of study – tracing the story of a 350 year old cottage in Whittlesey. By ploughing through Manorial Court Books, parish registers and census material at the County Record Office she has compiled a detailed record of one building and its occupants, and at the same time shown the way for other researchers. There are various sidelights including a 1635 ban on smoking in the streets - not for any medical reason but for fear of fire amongst the thatched buildings and straw-strewn yards, a bye-law imposing a 10/- fine "for every pipe or parte of a pipe she or they shall soe smoake or take"

Anthony Day sees the fens through his artist's eye and writes about them with his historian's expertise. Both these attributes come together admirably in his latest book "Fen & Marshland villages". This mixture of old photographs and picture postcards is culled from a number of sources, from the author's own files of Wicken material, from the Lilian Ream Collection at Wisbech, from Wisbech Museum and Kings Lynn library and our own Cambridgeshire Collection files.

Unlike many similar books the author has researched the story behind each picture and often has discovered the actual names of the people depicted, as at Mrs Walling's classroom at Wicken school in 1932 with members of the Bird, Canham, Bailey, Clements and Griggs families amongst them. Next page brings us the famous "Five Miles from Anywhere" inn at Upware at the time that Day's grandparents, Ben & Kate Read kept the inn and supplemented their bar takings by running the ferry which plied across the Cam, charging a penny for a pedestrian, twopence for a cyclist, fourpence for pony & trap, sixpence for horse & cart & twopence a head for cattle. It was not unusual to carry a dozen at a time, nor was it unknown for such a load to sink the ferry, leaving the cattle stranded in mid-stream. Elsewhere ferries were replaced by bridges, which were themselves renewed, as at Stretham, when the strength of the new structure was tested by placing traction engines on it - if it survived that weight, it would surely survive anything!

Though bridges survive and village streets still retain some of the buildings glimpsed through the photographs, there is a side of fenland life that has disappeared. In the rich agricultural acres it is agriculture that has changed, As the author points out gone are the hoeing and harvesting gangs, the women and boys crawling along the land singling sugar beet or heads-down sowing or gathering potatoes. Now they are replaced with a lone tractor equipped with spraying equipment, combines moving like giant snails, the sugar beet harvester tumbling its roots into the empty trailer alongside and the potato lifter-sheltering its crew of sorters behind heavy cloths. Tony Day reflects the bygone practices through some of his pictures - fruit growers at Cottenham, osier-stripping at Willingham making the baskets needed for harvesting potatoes & fruit, turf-digging at Burwell which employed as many as 300 men women at boys at the turn of the century, He depicts too the trainloads from London who arrived in the fens to pick fruit from the vast orchards around Wisbech, women and children working alongside men, and the important- role of the young girl leading the horse and cart piled high with straw to a farm at Newton, knowing how to avoid the ruts and ditches and steer accurately through gateways,

Day's combination of picture and caption captures an area and way of life now past. It is a book that will stimulate memories even for people who do not know the fens, for schools and reminiscence work with the elderly it will prove invaluable and for those who personal connections with the places have featured it will make fascinating reading

Recent press reports on the way certain colleges are seeking to raise revenue for additional building through the Business Expansion Scheme have been echoed this week by the acquisition of a microfilm copy of a report we already held. Microfilm is likely to survive longer than paper, especially if the item is used extensively, though these particular items are not in everyday use, nor on first glance do they seem especially interesting.

Published in 1874 the Report of the University Commission looks in detail at the property and income of the Universities of Oxford & Cambridge and their colleges. It was compiled by sending detailed questionnaires, preceded by a letter from Prime Minister Gladstone seeking the fullest co-operation of all concerned. In this the Commissioners were to be disappointed for Corpus Christi College answered "imperfectly" whilst the Master of Sidney Sussex - who was also the Bursar, responsible for the day-to-day accounting - declined to co-operate, , instead sending a pamphlet which the Commissioners had to plod through and sort out details for themselves.

The full returns called for a note of the property owned by each college, its income and expenditure for 1871 - revealing that the Master of Christ's received just over £1,142, whilst Trinity had paid £2,670 to its head. They were quizzed on their property holdings, showing St Johns to own a number of houses, shops and pubs in Bridge Street, including Cox's Yard, Sussum's Yard, Globe Passage and the Old Red Lion Yard where Alfred Wisbey was pub tenant paying a rent of £30. They also owned much of Sussex Street, of which the cheapest was a shop and dwelling house at number 13 rented to Arthur Looker at £10. Then there was Charles Lestourgeon's surgery in Trinity Street, George Benfield's house in Castle Street and the Rev Luckock's dwelling in Newnham for which he paid. £100.

Then they pried into the colleges' repairs fund, fire insurance fund, coal account - from which St John's made an annual profit of £921 which they spent on articles for the use of its undergraduates - though the Commissioner's felt they should pay for the rent of the coal-shed out of the profit. They were equally keen to probe the bakehouse account - the college baking bread which it sold to its members (another £61 profit) and the beer account which brought in over £1,760 - though surely the rent of the cellars, part of the salary of the steward & the two butlers ought to be met from this money.

Caution money - a payment of £10 or £15 taken from Undergraduates at the beginning of their studies from which any unpaid bills could be settled - was often overseen by individual tutors, as were other payments for tuition, maintenance, fees and room rents, and some argued that these were a private matter, not for Commissioner's eyes - perhaps because this was a potentially-lucrative source of revenue to supplement a college stipend.

The details go on and on, listing mining land - coal in Derbyshire, coprolites at Steeple Morden, profits from forestry, expenditure on repairs - nearly £9,000 for a new Master's Lodge and £1,233 for an enlargement to the organ in the new Chapel at St John's which itself had cost over £50,000 - not counting the painted windows. All in all a most rewarding source for those with the financial skill to understand and the time to study

THE PARISH council didn't want it and wrote and told the county council so. They protested to the Government but to no avail.

Three hundred acres of agricultural land were to be requisitioned for a new airfield, without waiting for the crops to be harvested — giant machines moved into the fields and crushed the corn flat. It was a daft place to build an aerodrome anyway, on a sloping site with a hump in the middle and woods nearby . . . but the imminent danger of war overrode everything.

Constructors moved in — Indians, Pakistanis, Irishmen; not everyone welcomed them, though the request for an armoured car to protect against attack was to deter Germans, not Steeple Morden residents.

Searchlights were established — doubtless upsetting the locals even more, especially when their beams so dazzled the pilot of a Hurricane that he feared he might collide with planes on either side of him and baled out, his plane crashing into an orchard next to the church.

Such a wealth of information is contained in a most detailed account of "A village airfield at war" that it will interest people who could not find Steeple Morden on a map. It recalls the arriving airmen, some of whom were billeted at the village telephone exchange but whose over-loud gramophone meant that the operator couldn't hear the phone ring. Women joined the scene with the arrival of the Land Army but their pay of £1.8s (£1.40) for a 50-hour week was not destined to go far at the bar of the Crown pub.

Ken Wells's study records the training and the missions, the bombing raids and the unexpected arrival of a German Ju88, whose crash-landing on the airfield was witnessed by one of the village constables, John Savage. Thinking it was a Wellington bomber he ran towards it, but seeing the swastika on the tail beat an equally hasty retreat.

A chapter on the village home front gives much welcome information about the activities of the local volunteers. The air raid wardens toured the area blowing a whistle to warn of raids and ringing a bell for the all-clear. Later Charles Rigg decided to buy an air raid siren for the village. Although the county council established shelters, some people preferred to sit on the bench on the recreation ground and take their chances there.

Litlington villagers, however, packed their shelter when a land mine fell in the garden next to Leache's Garage and failed to explode. Fire watchers and fire fighters were prepared for emergencies with a pump towed by an ageing Hillman car.

Charlie Potten was in charge of first aid, the Ladies Home Knitting Fund made socks and gloves, gardeners "dug for victory" and the Home Guard learned useful German words such as "Hande Hoch" for when they captured Hitler's storm-troopers. What words they used when Ernie Willmott's sten gun got stuck on continuous fire and sent them all diving for cover is one of the few details omitted from this fascinating book.

The Americans succeeded to the airfield — a satellite base for Bassingbourn. Their activities have no place in this volume apart from the story of the lady whose black limousine pulled up alongside men repairing the road. She asked for directions to Steeple Morden airfield, where her son was Commander, but was told that such information was secret.

When she asked: "Do you know who I am? I'm the wife of the President of the United States" the workman replied: "Well, I'm Winston Churchill." He wasn't, but Mrs Eleanor Roosevelt was.

Two new village histories have come in within days of each other. Each are major studies, one of 122 pages, the other over 250. One was largely researched in the Cambridgeshire Collection, the other compiled without our assistance. They are very different but equally interesting, especially for those with connection in either Teversham or Fowlmere

Pat White, Mary Symonds and Catherine Mason started their researches by transcribing the Teversham items indexed in the files of the Cambridge Chronicle newspaper between 1770 and 1893. These record the typical events that attracted attention - as when Mr Grain's horse suddenly panicked in Petty Cury in 1844, galloping off towards Christ's college gateway where it began to plunge and kick in a very frightful manner, smashing the chaise to atom before bolting off down St Andrew's Street. Mr Grain and family were unhurt - though several of them were thrown into the waterways along the road - a branch of Hobson's Conduit now filled in. Poor Mr Grain suffered again in 1848 when hailstones as large as pigeon's eggs fell in the Papermills (Newmarket Road) area that July, damaging his crops.

This gentleman seems to have had a sense of humour for he named his son Richard Corney Grain - which occasioned much comment and did no harm at all for the lad became a famous entertainer whose comic songs and sketches were fashionable in the 1880s. He later wrote his memories "Corney Grain, by himself" in which he recalled life in his home village including the music which accompanied hymns in church, Perhaps accompaniment might not be the proper word for the church orchestra consisted of two clarinets and a cello, an unusual trio, though not as unusual as the sound they produced, There was no attempt at harmony, or even melody, Each individual went his own way, producing alarms and excursions at the most unexpected moments,

Part of these memoirs are included in the Teversham history which also features a wide range of extracts from all manner of sources, including the 1851 census with its list of residents, Altogether it forms a compendium of information from which many a history can be compiled.

Dennis Hitch by contrast has produced a comprehensive chronology of "A mere village" - Fowlmere, tracing its story to pre-Roman times, detailing the campaigns that brought the area under Roman rule and carrying the story through the Civil War to the 1914-18 conflict when a field was commandeered for the construction of an airfield for the Royal Flying Corps. Soon up to 300 Scottish and Irish workmen were based in the village, labouring during the day and winning the hearts of local lasses in the evening - to the consternation of the Rector who refused to allow marriages between the Roman Catholic Irish and Fowlmere girls in his church. The airfield was abandoned in 1913, only to be reinstated during the Second War. The Mere which gives the village its name and the book its title was an open sheet of water until 1846, teeming with wildlife providing fish and fowl for the poor labourer's pot, sport for the gentry and income from those who took University gentlemen out in their punts for a day's shooting - while other locals would be happy to sell a few wild duck to those whose ability to aim did not match their academic prowess. After drainage part was used for growing watercress and has subsequently become a bird sanctuary and nature reserve

Modern surveys and reports are regular additions to our New Books shelves and recent weeks have seen the arrival of an analysis of Cambridge based on the 1991 census compiled by the County Council's Research Group. The figures show that of the 91,933 residents nearly 20% are pensioners - with men outnumbered nearly 2-1. Over half the houses are owner-occupied; a quarter are rented from the council and over a third occupied by a single person. The figures go on and on - over 15,000 people changed house within the past year - over one third of the households have no car, though this rises to nearly half of those living in the centre of town.

Figures can be manipulated or interpreted in various ways. The popular view is that Cambridge is a wealthy city is rebutted by another survey of just issued. "Poverty in Cambridge 1993" shows that over 18,500 citizens are living on the margins of poverty - somewhat higher than the number of poor people entertained to tea on Parker's Piece on the occasion of Queen Victoria's coronation in 1838.

It is interesting to compare some of the findings of the 1993 Poverty report with a similar study produced in 1906, "Cambridge; a brief study in social questions" was compiled by Eglantyne Jebb and in over 270 pages considers many of the topics more recently surveyed,

In 1993 unemployment inflicts some 4,462 people but 90 years ago Jebb found no evidence to support that claim that there were 1-2,000 people out of work - indeed she found that in the St Matthews's area only 10 people had registered, so social workers made a survey of 373 men and found 73 out of work. However further analysis showed that nearly half of these were either ill or too old with a 73 year old Cabinet-maker complaining that all the work went to the younger men. Although the building trade was in depression there was plenty of work to be had on the new sewer system - then, as now, under construction in the Chesterton area.

Many of the unemployed were, she claimed, beggars and loafers, refusing hard work or complaining it was too low paid to be worth doing. Other work was irregular with the University laying off staff for months each summer and several weeks in winter when the college students went down. On the other hand women found work as college servants or in the 620 licensed University lodging houses, whilst 600 were employed in laundries and between 200 and 400 at Chivers jam factory.

On housing Jebb found in the Barnwell district 12 households sleeping six and over to a bedroom, 15 houses sharing one tap and another 24 who shared a water-closet with two neighbouring houses. These conditions might appal even the 298 homeless people recorded in the 1993 survey or the estimated 150 who sleep rough

Today the survey shows over 5,000 people seeking assistance for debt with the average sum being £5,000 with over half of households in receipt of Housing Benefit, In 1906 Jebb claimed that life was now too easy and that the fear of starvation, which prompted a man to make great efforts to save, had been removed, "The harsh and extreme penalties for failure to provide for the family, for sickness, for old age, have one by one been removed ; the children are educated free, in sickness there is the hospital, in old age the workhouse", and at every step there was charity to soften the problems, Her answer was for the employed to save penny by penny at the Post Office Savings Bank so they had a nest-egg to draw on when times were hard.

After nearly 90 years it seems the problems remain, though perhaps the remedies have changed

There is a temptation to think that history is dead - but much more is constantly coming to light. Only recently a prehistoric fort has been discovered at Sawston. dominating the surrounding countryside and covering an area of some 8 hectares, making it the second largest in the county. It was spotted by a local archaeologist and has been surveyed by a team of field recorders based at the Royal Commission for Historical Monuments at Gt Shelford. This is just one of the 800 new sites and finds added to the Archaeologists' records each year- including a spectacular burial of a child complete with copper bangles and pottery figurines unique in Britain unearthed at Godmanchester.

Meanwhile another researcher from the Institute of Historical Research, London University has been deciphering the complicated history of the small parish of Ashley cum Silverley near Newmarket which once had two churches, both now gone apart from a ruined stump of the church tower at Silverley. The results of his work will be known in some years' time when the final volume of the Victoria History of the County of Cambridge is produced. It will join the many books on Cambridgeshire over 60 of which have been produced in recent months.

These various developments are featured in the latest issue of "Conduit", a six-monthly bulletin published by the Cambridge Antiquarian Society, now produced by a team of County Council Heritage Officers and edited by County Archaeologist, Alison Taylor. Much of the journal is devoted to the activities of many local history societies whose programmes promise a fascinating mixture of meetings – on 350 years of Royal Mail at Royston, Grandma's kitchen at Sawtry, the new Cambridge sewer project will attract the Industrial archaeologists who will also enjoy a talk on the history of Marshall's airport (Cambridgeshire Local History-Society 6th November), Ely archaeologists will flock to Mike Young's account of his trip to Sri Lanka - perhaps as entertaining as the reconstruction of Cambridgeshire life during the 1000s whose fighting skills are practiced on Midsummer Common by members of Raefield (the Early medieval re-enactment society) - but probably not to be compared with John Humphreys' evocation of life in Hunter's Fen which he will present at Swavesey in December. From the four corners of the county come dates and details, whilst any other secretaries looking for speakers would do well to peruse those listed here.

For those wishing to learn rather than just listen there are details of courses such as "History through objects" at the Cambridge Folk Museum - or a new Certificate in Historic Building Conservation being run by the University of Cambridge Board of Continuing Education whose students will visit buildings under repair to watch craftsmen at work before researching a dissertation.

The archivists at Cambridge and Huntingdon report some of their recent accessions - such as the school log books from Soham where in 1871 only 6 of 71 pupils could put down numbers but where a report just eight years later was praising the arithmetic and recommending that the boys be taught knitting. Meanwhile at Kimbolton Castle in November 1865 some 470lbs of meat, 12 rabbits, 10 chickens and 300 eggs were consumed in one week during the visit of the Price of Teck who arrived weighing 12 stone 10 and perhaps departed somewhat heavier. On a lighter note the report from the Norris Museum, St Ives, charts the love life of Dinner the Museum duck whose courtship of a pretty Muscovy duck named Little Lunch resulted in a clutch of eggs, some of which they ate, the rest they deserted. A rival male was chased away by a lady museum assistant, since when true love seems to have been re-established and a new brood awaited. Further details of the saga, together with the next round of meetings avid discoveries will be carried in the next issue of "Conduit", copies of which cost £1.00 from museums, societies, Cambridge Library shop or direct from Alison Taylor at Shire Hall

Two more War books arrived on my desk within days of each other. One is mainly pictures, the other un-readable.

It was 30 November 1943 that Bottisham began to become used to being an American air base and the streets started to resound with the southern drawl of Virginian fighter pilots, aircrew, support staff & the rest of the paraphernalia, marshalled by Thomas J.J. Christian junior, Officer Commanding. Some 1,700 personnel were expected, enlisted men accommodated in village homes, the officers quartered at Bottisham Hall. By Christmas eve they had won over local children, welcoming them - and their mothers - to a party in the NAAFI buildings, American rations making a welcome treat from standard British wartime fare.

Already steel matting had been planted over farmers fields to form runways and early in 1944 the arrival of over 50 Thunderbolts destroyed the tranquillity of rural life and heralded the start of a new chapter in the fight against the foe. There were difficulties to be ironed out nearer home with an Anglo-American brains trust called in Bottisham Village College to discuss differences between the new Allies. Very soon villagers got used to the sight of the aircraft taking off, banking, landing and crashing, whilst farmers elsewhere found the occasional addition to their cropping rotation with the unexpected arrival of a pranged plane in their fields.

All this is recorded in a pictorial history of the 361st Fighter Group which utilises dozens of photographs taken at the time, many by American servicemen, including snapshots showing excursions to Burwell by bicycle, to Cambridge by bus or to the Red Lion at Swaffham Prior by any means possible. Most of the photos show fighting men in action or at rest. One who posed for a professional portrait at Ramsey & Muspratt was Lt Rogers. Sadly by the time the picture reached home the sitter was dead, lost 35 miles east of Great Yarmouth when his flak-damaged P-47 came down in the sea. His negative is filed in the Cambridgeshire Collection, his story now told.

The fight in which he was engaged carried on with his colleagues flying from Bottisham over the D-Day beaches - a picture of the briefing in the Nissen hut appearing in the book. But before the war was ended the fighters had themselves moved on for in September 1944 they transferred to Little Walden in Essex where the cameras capture similar scenes, with the scenery different - the Fox at Ashdon now finding itself the subject of attention for off-duty pilots.

In their tours of duty the "Little Friends" had provided escort for their big brothers, the bombers who had carried the battle to Berlin, weakening the enemy's fighting capacity, devastating his cities and smashing the morale of his population. But just as British children had been scrambled from London during the blitz so American and British bombs caused untold casualties amongst German children. Victory in Europe secured, the American pilots were awaiting transfer to the Pacific when news came through of the bombing of Hiroshima and the Cambridge papers were quick to stress the local connection with the Atom bomb. Now some Japanese ladies who as children had their lives devastated by the action of adults have pieced together an account of what each country inflicted on the other's babies. It has no pictures but is a work of art to eyes unused to the Japanese script. For page after page just the odd words like "Cambridge" and "Berlin" are recognisable, but if one ever needed a reason to learn another's language it must surely be to read this account by a group of Tokyo housewives of the impact of war on the innocent and their mothers.

"Little friends ; a pictorial history of the 361st fighter group in World War II" by Steve Gotts, available from author or Cambridge Library shop for £26,00 The Group Isis book is in - Japanese script; they can be contacted at

Some weeks ago I featured two of Cambridge's lesser known photographers-. this week much more of their work: has been given to the Collection

William Ewart Liles was born in April 1886, the youngest child of a family of eight. Their home was ill Fitzroy Street & not surprisingly some of the photographs he took feature that area, including a unique view .of Gold Street, now disappeared under the Kite redevelopment, a milk lady in Corona Road and the water pump at the junction of Barton and Coton Road. My favourite however remains a picture of his father, shoemaker Benjamin Liles working away in his Fitzroy Street shop which captures the atmosphere of a craftsman at work, the tools of his trade around him. William developed and printed his own photographs, propping the printing up in the windows and carefully watching until they were just right. His were cared for by his daughter who has now lodged them with us so they may be shared with others.

Herbert Samuel Johnson (1881-1971), founder of Johnson & Bailey the builders was an enthusiastic photographer who, I wrote, was said to have amassed a copious library of Cambridge scenes which had changed during his life-time. At that time we had just a few which he had contributed to the Cambridge Antiquarian Society's photographic record in 1930, was there any hope that the rest might have survived.

This week came the answer: a box which included an envelope of loose pictures taken or collected by Johnson, now donated by his family. I opened it up and sifted through them to reveal a wonderful mixture – views of Midsummer Fair c1929, a party in Norfolk Street for King George VI's coronation, Post Office Terrace – a snapshot c 1950. There's a postcard of the great flood on Midsummer Common in 1879 - not one that Johnson took himself, a picture of the Garrick public house at the junction of Jesus Lane and King Street taken in 1885. Next comes Heffer's shop in Sidney Street c1930, the Three Tuns, Castle Hill, the Cross Keys opposite Magdalene College, views of Peas Hill and Market Hill in the mid 1930s ... and so on. To select a favourite view is difficult. Several of the nicest ones we have seen before, or they will show an area also recorded by somebody else. Some are hand-coloured, others soft-focus. I like views of the official proclamation on Market Hill of George V's silver jubilee in 1935, a snap of Mrs Roosevelt during her war-time visit to the Friends Meeting House in Jesus Lane and a view of the hot pea stall at Midsummer Fair – surely an unusual subject. In the end I will tease you with two views of scenes which have changed somewhat in the 60 years since Johnson photographed them, but which still contain enough clues to enable recognition.

It will take several months before this week's accessions are properly catalogued – but it will certainly be a most interesting way to spend the time between enquiries! Meanwhile more are promised and who knows what tomorrow may bring?

Two fenland communities come under the spotlight in the latest volume of Proceedings published by the Cambridge Antiquarian Society. However despite all the research there are still mysteries associated with both 6th-century Haddenham and 20th-century Isleham which have yet to be resolved.

The garden of the Three Kings public house in Haddenham used to be famous for its early potatoes. Then in 1989 it was decided to extend the car park and the JCB was booked. Before it started work however the landlord allowed a friend to run over the site with a metal detector. What he found brought the County Archaeologist hot-foot to the scene and her team quickly identified a grave.

Fragments of pottery were dated to the Anglo-Saxon period from which the name of the village "Haeda's Ham (or homestead) itself dates.

It also reawakened memories of another great discovery, that of St. Ovin's cross which the antiquarian James Bentham discovered being used as a mounting block in the village street in the 1750s and caused to be removed to Ely Cathedral. Ovin had been steward to St Etheldreda and had founded a church at Haddenham in 673, the same year that she had founded the Cathedral. Yet now it appeared from the iron spearhead detected might be even earlier.

Further excavations unearthed more burials. Some were a mixture of bodies and bones - obviously disturbed by previous ditch-cutting and quietly dumped back - but one revealed a man and woman laying together, resting on a bed of pebbles, her hand beneath his back. He had been almost six foot tall, heavily built and about 50 years old, she some eight inches shorter, thirty years younger and probably his wife. She wore amber beads and a brooch, he had carried a shield, spear and knife. All this could be deduced from the skeletons.

The question remains as to where they had actually lived. The surrounding fen would have been waterlogged and uninhabitable so their homes would have been close by, probably in a hollow shielded from the wind but near to the fen which would have given them their living. Probably under somebody's garden the answer still lies waiting to be unearthed - perhaps when digging potatoes.

In "Who were the fen people" Polly Hill has been agonising over a much more recent time. She has turned extensive experience in researching communities in West Africa to consider the group of people who made their homes alongside the river bank at Isleham in the nineteenth-century. Were they really the hard-breeding, opium-eating, incestuous folk that tradition would maintain inhabited such isolated areas. There is little record of the humdrum day-to-day working life of the ordinary fenlander but she pieces together details from the census returns between 1841 and 1891 identifying the occupation of the men and speculating on the role of their womenfolk who in the 1860s could earn wages of just 8d or 9d (4p) a day to supplement their husbands 10/- (50p) a week. No wonder they sent young children out to work in labour gangs, picking twitch, planting potatoes, pulling carrots and mangold wurzels for the princely sum of 6d (2p) a day. The living conditions were as hard as their work in damp cold homes whose water was fetched from across the high river bank on to which the dwellings abutted. Many families quit the Cambridgeshire fens for the promise of wealth in the New World, 21 leaving Isleham itself in 1852. But of the large families she finds little evidence with over half having less than four children, incest no higher than recent research suggests is common throughout the Kingdom and the opium claims overstated. She believes the perceived image is merely a myth originally put out by the University when fighting the drainage of the seventeenth century which would destroy the river trade on which Cambridge relied in the interests of certain wild men who inhabited the fen

Like the other papers in the Proceedings Polly Hill has certainly stimulated new thinking!

If "Heritage" reflects the past so the video camera epitomises the present. The product of the one is permanent, that of the other ephemeral. This week they have combined.

The visit to the Central Library of the Secretary of State for National Heritage on Monday prompted some tidying of corners, some relabelling of notices and some dramatic resiting of the Cambridgeshire Heritage Showcase which for the past-several months has been housed in the Mezzanine Gallery off the Lending Library.

The combination of displays from archaeologist, archivist, museums officer, building conservation and libraries was already destined to move back to the third floor, adjacent to the Cambridgeshire Collection and the Library Shop, but the visit gave us the impetus to drop everything else and mobilise resources. Frantic activity resulted in all being ready on the night. Then amongst the flashes from attendant press photographers and the more constant probing of the television cameras He was in, looking at the pictures, maps, documents, artefacts before the presentation - a map of the road from Oxford to Cambridge in the days before Milton Keynes, for the Ministerial opening of an exhibition already 10 months old, and then off into a Lion Yard for once lacking its more normal nocturnal occupants, and now replaced with besuited gentlemen whom not even the drunkest would accost. Within minutes it was on the telly - and those who blinked would have missed it. but, those who videoed it could watch again and again,

Wednesday night and it was video again - but this time planning of a drama-documentary of the almost-disastrous floods of 1897, averted only through the skilful engineers who worked the great steam pump at Stretham and the dozens of men who responded to the late-night ringing of the town-criers bell and left hearth and family to trudge into the fen to labour for hours on river banks which were cracking and leaking under the weight of water which threatened to engulf the surrounding fertile land. Because their labours were successful their story was never told - who now remembers anything of it, whose family has tales of that-night, can they be tracked down, can a forgotten episode be rescued from obscurity and their heroic efforts at last recognised? In a few minutes of television millions could learn of the activities of one night in the fen, but it will be hours in the planning, hours in the making and hours in the discussions with accountants and executives before it ever reaches the screen.

Thursday night was video again - a video that had been hours in the planning ... but which was now formally launched. It follows a group of Homerton students who trace the story of their college through its architecture, its artefacts, the mementoes and memories of those who had once studied there, and who then went on to learn more in "the archives" - but in fact found themselves in the local studies library - showing that even teachers can become confused about which resources are where and the essential interrelationship between archivist, archaeologist, curator and librarian. Which is why of course the Showcase was created.

The video has been produced by the Education Service of English Heritage, launched days after the National Heritage Minister had visited the Cambridgeshire Heritage Showcase ,, "Heritage" is the current buzz word, sadly none of the "Heritage Officers" can stand it!

Returning from a few days break on the South Coast I find myself scanning advertisements for Bournemouth - the "perpetual holiday resort : no dull moments, the season never ends" where terms for a hotel on the West Cliff start at 3 guineas - somewhat different from those now current on the East Cliff! - but when were they so charged? The answer to that question would provide a clue as to the date of one particular edition of the old Ward Lock Guide book to Cambridge now being catalogued. The actual volume provides some assistance for there is mention of the Folk Museum – "fast becoming one of the most fascinating in Cambridge" - housed in the former White Horse Inn, converted to this use in 1936, a picture of the new Guildhall, completed in 1933 but not formally opened due to the imminence of war. But a later date comes from the advert for the British Sailors' Society, reminding us of the hazards of a seafarer's life with the note that it spent one and a half million pounds during the years 1944-45.

Much of the text in the guidebook itself does not however change - "narrow roadways with narrower pavements where ruthless perambulators and trick-cyclists on push-bikes conspire to thrust one under motors" - now partially remedied. Modern visitors might however puzzle over reference to streets "haunted after-dusk by malignant demons with attendant satellites whose sole business is to molest the innocent student on his unlawful occasions". This relates to the University Proctors and their "bull-dogs" who were charged with maintaining discipline and preventing the infringement by undergraduates of regulations such as that of wearing cap and gown.

Such practices are still recalled in more modern guidebooks, such as that now issued by Pitkin in a variety of languages. Thus alongside colour photographs of formal gowned grads en route to the Senate House there is an 1887 illustration, from the Cambridgeshire Collection, of a student, properly attired, but with a forbidden cigarette concealed behind his back - an offence which was later to cost the future King George VI a fine during his own student days.

With such a mixture of historic buildings and quaint traditions it is no wonder that the streets of Cambridge are frequently packed with tourists. Yet today there is talk of seeking resort status to enable shops to trade on Sundays. Inevitably this is no new idea. In 1912 the railway companies were suggesting advertising Cambridge like a seaside town to encourage visitors during the Long Vacation - and so provide trade for shops which tended to close when the students had gone.

The railways have played a great part in the development of tourism, despite University attempts to relegate the station to the outskirts of town and prevent trains stopping on Sundays.

By 1853 "The Pictorial guide to Cambridge" was claiming that the majority of visitors reached the town by means of the Eastern Counties Railway. They arrived at "one of the best stations I have seen for many a day", where some chose to visit the "handsome refreshment room" before indulging themselves with a cheap ride in the luxury of a remarkably clean and well-padded omnibus along Hills Road where they would join those who had arrived by other, "semi-barbarous modes of transit" for a tour of the sights - many of which remain today as described then.

But what of the more human side of academic life - the students, "half of whom have been tugging away on the Cam, and the other half at Greek and mathematics" now returning back to their college - and "look what joyous faces they all have". In college kitchens with their long arrays of roaring fires and twirling joints a score of cooks and scullery maids are grilling and boiling and chopping and pounding to prepare a meal fit for such paragons of academic excellence - and far too good for the tourist who must resort to the only slightly more meagre fare of the station buffet!

It is all too easy to get behind with the papers. Part of my job is to select cuttings from the contemporary local press and I am content if I am only one month behind - but even so it represents a massive pile to get through. One advantage in being so far behind is that it is then easier to assess the significance of the story, and many new ideas will have been discussed and rejected before the cutting is finally filed.

After a while newspapers get more interesting in retrospect than they were on publication and people will bring us issues of the Cambridge News from the 1960s, or the Cambridge Independent Press from a decade or so earlier. Then there will be the even older fragments which are often found lining drawers or under floorboards, each one fascinating to the finder.

One day recently a reader brought in a copy of the "Cambridge Chronicle and Journal and Huntingdonshire Gazette" for 1812. Not just one page, or one issue, but a complete year. True the cover is off and the first page of the first issue is missing but still a remarkable find considering just how long this had been around. Let us examine just one issue - the four pages published on Friday November 13 1812

For a start there is the price - it cost six-pence halfpenny (2½ p), half of which was a "tax on knowledge" imposed by the government, which also taxed the income from the advertisements which made up much of the newspapers pages. Such charges made production financially challenging, to say nothing of printing difficulties and distribution costs and may have contributed to the absence of any rival paper at this time. News had to be gathered from various sources - much garnered from London papers - set up in type and printed in a weekly edition of about 700 copies. International affairs, and especially wars, were big news but little space devoted to local issues.

Page one reports the "Corsican Monster", Napoleon, seeking peace with the "magnanimous" Russian Czar in the depths of a Russian winter, whilst other despatches from Cadiz report the activities of the army under Lord Wellington, though news from France has been delayed through adverse winds and tempestuous weather. Elsewhere are reports on the health of King George III - "his disorder-has again subsided" and a new discovery by Sir Humphrey Davy. Alongside come public notices and auctions, cures for baldness and adverts for a new coffee.

Battles continue to dominate the second page, with news of the capture of Moscow by the Russian army, but of more local interest is a report on the proposed canal from Cambridge to Bishop's Stortford, activities of the Ely turnpike road trustees and sale of a gang of lighters at Earith. Opposite comes an announcement of a new stagecoach from Cambridge to Birmingham and sales of things as diverse as the late Waterbeach vicar's books & furniture, the Bull pub at Toft or Edward Lunn's post chariot and two coach horses, now on view at the Falcon Yard stables. A poem. Old Bailey court cases, the robbery of the Leeds Mail coach when money bags containing £15,000 disappeared from the locked seat on which the coachman and guard sat and the story of a girl who poisoned her brother with opium and was broken alive on the wheel all cram themselves on the last page,

So where is the local news? A single column on page three. Professor Christian will start his lectures, some appointments, marriages and deaths - including the wife of the butler at St Catharine's college; militia movements, a meeting of foxhounds, a robbery at Woolpit, a horse race at Peterborough and an account of Stamford market - but nothing of Cambridgeshire ,, perhaps next week.

Such few Cambridgeshire stories, advertisements and court cases that were published in the Cambridge Chronicle between 1770 and 1813 have been indexed together with village news up to 1900. Though often brief they do make a most interesting contribution to the life and times of local folk and emphasise the importance of local newspapers to the local researcher.

Evil and murder emanate from various new books this week, some in fact, some in fiction and some engraved in stone.

Few may have encountered St Agatha's college on the junction of Chesterton Lane and Castle Hill nor know of its ancient Wyndham library whose books must never be removed nor added to. Yet it was in the locked library that the body of Philip Skellow was discovered together with a book which did not belong there - a book stolen from the house of college nurse Imogen Quay who lived in Newnham. As local police try to unravel the mystery they encounter a marked reluctance from the students to discuss the days immediately preceding the murder and nurse Quay, amongst all her other medical duties, is increasingly drawn into the investigation. In "The Wyndham Case" Jill Paton Walsh, the distinguished children's writer, introduces her readers to something of the inner workings of a Cambridge college with its jealousies and intrigue.

David Thurlow has written several murder mysteries set in the local area but in "Evil in East Anglia" turns his attention to various true-life cases which he covered whilst a journalist. The story of the Cambridge rapist is still fresh in people's minds, but what of gypsy Jack Smith who swung from trees to murder and rape in Oakington in July 1960. One recalls the case of the football supporter killed by rioting Cambridge fans in 1977 but who recalls the murder some ten years earlier of an eleven year old boy who'd upset a sixteen-year old girl during the half-time interval and was later drowned by her in a brook on Coldham's Common. On a lighter note comes the case of the eccentric landlord of the Whittlesford pub named after his family, Kim de la Taste Tickell, who wore a monocle and knee breeches and had very decided views about just who should or should not be served in his establishment. It was one thing to be harangued by the landlord - in fact it was part of the fun of an evening out - but when a customer was wounded with a knife and chased out by an enraged publican waving a medieval mace the matter ended up in court.

The victim's bodies are eventually laid to rest amidst grief which is heightened by the horror of their deaths and two examples of such crime are featured in a new booklet by Eileen Clifford. In Isleham church lies the body of Roger Peachey, vicar for more than 37 years whose 1683 tombstone records also his "eldest sonn of Grades Inn . . . barbarously murdered by Mr Hatton of ye same society". Nearby lay 14 other sons and daughters, testament to the hardship of life at, that time.

The case of Mary Ann Weems is perhaps best remembered for the broadsheet issued after her murder in May 1813 but is more permanently recorded in Godmanchester graveyard. Her shotgun wedding to Thomas Weems soon fell apart and, wishing to be married to another woman, Thomas barbarously murdered her at Wendy. He was soon arrested and hanged at Cambridge castle, his body later being cut down and subjected to electric shock experiments in the University Anatomy School. The inscription on the gravestone includes the cautionary lines

"Ere Crime you perpetrate survey this Stone
Learn hence that God of Justice sleeps not on his Throne
But Marks the Sinner with unerring Eye
The suffering Victim hears and make the Guilty die"

In the 1950s you had to be a mechanic to understand the garage bill. Thus when Dr Pritchard took his Triumph 1800, registration number GER 500, to King & Harper in February 1955 his account included draining, flushing and refilling sump, greasing chassis, fitting new spring to gear lever, removing self starter, skimming and undercutting commutator, repositioning solenoid switch and retaping battery leads - as well as more mundane matters such as fitting a new exhaust mounting, adjusting brakes and freeing door locks. The bill amounted to £5,13,4 (£5.67). He also had to fork out an extra 76p for 11 pints of Castrolite as well as all the other odds and ends required.

But then in April he was back - this time for a new clutch and a reconditioned gearbox, brake cables and repairs to his indicators. Labour £8.20. parts £45,50 - and back again in December for more refilling of the sump, new plugs, repairing the arm rest, checking for water leaks and new core plugs to the cylinder block - another bill, this time nearly £9.00. This seems to have been the end for the garage loaned him a Standard Vanguard before on January 1st 1956 he took delivery of a brand new Rover Seventy Five saloon for the grand sum of £915.00 plus all the extras - purchase tax of £458.85, delivery charges of £5.25, ACE silver peak number plates at £3.50, road fund tax at £12.50 together with antifreeze, underseal, front seat, covers and 11½ gallons of petrol at £2.66.

All this is revealed in a few billheads recently received in the Collection, just part of an assortments of bits of paper from various sources within the last week. Others include a Certificate of Character for Miss Edith Browning who worked as temporary postwoman for some 18 months and performed her duties quite satisfactorily - or so Mr Bell the postmaster recorded in August 1917, & ration books from the same period - with the Imperial War Museum appealing already for mementoes of the war to add to their collection.

From West Molesey in Surrey have come bills dating from the 1940s together with a programme of the New Theatre for week commencing 12th July 1948 when the performance included Paddie O'Neil (the comedy girl from "Navy Mixture"). Marquis the Chimpanzee, Hughie Diamond ("Radio's greatest voice") and the famous BBC Comedy Bank from the Radio Show, The Nitwits. After the performance you could take coffee at Snax in Regent Street, whilst the Embassy Ballroom in Mill Road had dancing nightly - and King & Harper would supply electric cleaners, wireless sets as well as cars.

The Theatre had been founded by William Beales Redfern in the 1880s but although situated in St Andrew's street - "in the leading thoroughfare from the four railway stations to the Market Place" the building was inconvenient. It could hold some 700 people, the majority of whom came from the University, but there was no room to segregate smokers and the various classes were all mixed together. So in 1895 a new Company was established - "The New Theatre, Cambridge Ltd" intending to raise sufficient money to allow for rebuilding with the most modern requirements and with three separate areas so that a town audience could be encouraged to attend. This and more is revealed in copies of the Prospectus and share application forms which have also arrived this week.

But my favourite item must be a piece of paper issued to Dr Pritchard in 1936. It is entitled "Licence for armorial bearings, male servants, and dogs" and records payments required - coat of arms on a carriage £2.10, male servants 75p, dogs 36p

There seems at the moment to be a rush of new publications but for sheer quantity as well as quality it is the Shelfords who must take the prize. Two new booklets and the reprint of a third - with a fourth I understand in the pipeline - means that anybody who has any connections with either village can have no shortage of things to spend his book tokens on

Marjorie Westbrook has been associated with the Church of England Primary School for over thirty years, twenty of them as a Governor. She has drawn upon local knowledge as well as school log books, recollections, photographs and newspaper extracts to compile a history of the school from 1843 to the present day. In over 116 pages she records a wealth of detail making the book as interesting to students of education as to students of the school itself. There was considerable debate in 1904 as to whether the infants, boys and girls schools should be kept separate or amalgamated into one mixed school - there were fears of the opportunities of immorality if the master and mistresses and older girls were brought into proximity - and in 1907 the County Council was campaigning against the steady growth of cigarette smoking amongst pupils, The opening of Sawston village college in 1930 almost halved the number of Shelford pupils as all those over 11 years had to attend the new College whilst a teacher was also forcibly transferred and even the woodworking tools were removed Almost inevitably a group of schoolchildren feature amongst the 76 photographs selected by Margaret Ward for her book of postcards of the two villages. Many of the pictures were taken by Ted Mott and have probably not been developed before they were selected from the many dozen negatives he took of the Cambridge hinterland in the 1920s and 1930s. They have been chosen to reflect Shelford life when pleasures were simple, village entertainment revolved around the feast, flower show or gala and its residents found employment as higgler; milliner, stocking knitter or on the land, But the arrival of the motor car in otherwise deserted streets give a hint that Shelford was not to be a self-contained community for long.

A hint of village life in earlier times may be gleaned from "The Great Shelford Chronicle", a selection of stories appearing in Cambridge newspapers between 1774 and 1868. Like the other "Chronicles" this is full of interest – not least the story of John Stallan, hanged at Cambridge castle in 1833 for a series of incendiary fires he had started so that he would receive the payment of 6/6 (32p) he received as one of the fire-fighters. Reports that the victim had struggled whilst on the gallows were discounted by eyewitnesses - the body had merely been buffeted by the wind as it hung suspended. Another young man hanged himself after being arrested for stealing a chicken whilst such was the hardship of the time that families were forced to leave the village and seek a new life in the New World. This latest "Chronicle" has been well illustrated with pen and ink sketches which capture the spirit of the age and published with the assistance of the Parish Council, Rupert. Brooke wrote his famous poem on Grantchester whilst sitting in a German cafe in May 1912 where "sweating, sick and hot" he watched "German Jews drink beer around" and reminisced about life in an idyllic corner of England where one could "lie day-long ... flower lulled in sleepy grass". Yet his knowledge of the "lovely hamlet Grantchester" was limited to the few months he'd spent there in lodgings whilst a student, first at The Orchard where his landlord ran a tea garden during the Summer months and then at the Old Vicarage where Harry Neeve kept bees, supplying honey to the Tea Garden.

Generations of Grantchester residents with their "straight eyes", white skin and "lithe children lovelier than a dream" have basked in the glory of his description though neighbouring villages - "Ditton girls are mean and dirty", Shelford folk "have" twisted lips and twisted hearts" and Coton "full of nameless crimes" have less occasion to quote his lines

Despite the "rotten unforgettable unforgotten river smell" hordes of visitors to Grantchester still seek the honey for tea and the legendary "peace and holy quiet there". Yet the village today is different from that known by Brooke in the period 1911-1913 and now The Orchard Tea Garden have produced a new edition of the poem containing illustrations by Prof. E.N. Willmer which capture "What the poet saw" - the mill, the meadows, bosky wood and picturesque thatched cottages – though of course the other side of village life – that of the ordinary villagers who forsook their village homes and hardships to fight and die in some foreign field without ever seeing Berlin or its cafes.

The little hamlet of Grantchester stands alongside the little city of Cambridge whose story has now been told by Queens' college don, and townsman. John Holloway. It traces the development from the prehistoric times when dinosaurs tramped the land and mammoths roamed at Grantchester, Monks from Ely found a white empty coffin in marble on the edge of a ruined city - "quite near the place where in more recent time Presidents of Magdalene college used to bury their family pets - you can still see the carved stones somewhat neglected in the wild garden". The story continues - thirty houses pulled down to build a Castle, the development of Stourbridge Fair, the coming of the clerks with their learning and the struggles betwixt town and gown. His history is full of detail - a blind woman carried out of town, set down at the boundary and told to smell her way to Newmarket, Caius library floor littered with manuscripts whilst at Peterhouse in 1710 the reader "gets a towel to put around his middle as he looks at the filthy volumes".

The booklet contains illustrations – of surrounding fenland, of the castle in 1574, the barges moored at Mill Pool in 1798 or Victoria's coronation feast on Parker's Piece in 1838, but the pictures are unnecessary, for Holloway's history is a poem and his words paint the picture - of the blind child at the feast enjoying the "beef today, plum pudding, even kindness", Using a variety of verse forms he mingles geology, history, imaginative reconstruction, description and personal reflection to distil the essence of Cambridge, its history and spirit, taking the story beyond 1979 when "The Lion Yard lion is dusty red ... glares at the pop-booming boutiques they rent through the heart of our City. Across the garish arcade, in the Library ... a textile stegosaurus the children made for Christmas shrugs his rug shoulders and hilariously averts his jaunty if extinct gaze from the contemptible reminder of the dark, dignified, long-demolished inn : the Lion"

Schools and colleges will study it for both history and English but all will enjoy what A.L. Rowse has described as "the finest and most remarkable long poem since T.S. Eliot's 'Four Quartets' ... a unique tribute to Cambridge in the history and landscape of England ... there is nothing else like it"

Various booklets on various villages have recently examined various aspects of rural life. From Bourn has come an account of the footpaths in the vicinity describing six circular walks, some starting from the village pubs, crossing fields and bridges, past kingfishers, barns and the Infertility Clinic and including historical notes on some of the sights. Those repeating the exercise in Histon might spot the various lumps and bumps which mark the site of one of the village's two churches, St Etheldreda's demolished about 1600 so that its lead, timber, stones and bell could be used for the building of Madingley Hall It seems that certain of the material was subsequently brought back to Histon to be used during the rebuilding of its other church, St Andrew's, in 1874, The church's builder was also working at Madingley where he discovered a large section of clunch which including the remains of various church windows, The parish bought them back and used them to line the chancel walls.

One interesting sideline to the episode is a section of stained glass in the Library at Madingley which depicts a youth on the run carrying a church with lettering around the edge asking "Who stole Histon church" - the answer is revealed in the new guide to Histon parish church just published by the Village Society, This is the 14th in a series of booklets covering many aspects of local history, others of which look at the villages houses and their stories

Roger Rudderham's latest publication "Tales of old Littleport" also describes various intriguing aspects of local life - like the story of the old miser of Red Cow Drive, Tabitha

Camm was reported to the Guardians of the Poor as being in a distressed state. The roof of her cottage had partially collapsed, the walls were crumbling and the windows falling out - surely she would be more comfortable in the parish workhouse! They send out the Medical Officer who ordered her to undertake repairs - but she refused. So they got authority to remove her to the poorhouse - but Tabitha was having none of it and refused to budge - the only way she would leave her cottage was in a wooden box! When that time came, in March 1898, it was found that she had a small fortune of £400 sewn into her stays, but had been too mean to spend it.

Such insights are also contained in "Forbidden path" - Bottisham reminiscences, 1900-1933 with its sections on the Great War - when Amy Muncy saw "an ugly moving black thing against the sky" - a Zeppelin, on village pubs, including the aptly named "Wait for the Bus" which lost its licence in 1905, and social life such as the village feast whose roundabout used to frighten Violet Whiting.

We meet the village policeman who was run over by a traction engine in 1905. the donkey-drawn village fire engine which featured in the "Daily Mirror", the cinema which used to operate at the British Legion Hall and the lads who discovered they could fire small stones at the church clock using a catapult which came free with liquorice sweets sold at the local shop. Another section tours the village streets, telling the story of the cottages and their former occupants.

One of the best known characters was William Hine, a shoemaker who taught draughts and dominoes and organised treasure hunts by hiding OXO tins with coins in around the village. When he went on holiday he would wrap a three-penny piece and hide it in one of the ditches so that the children could look for it whilst he was away. At other times they were welcomed into his hut where each child who was well behaved was given a half-penny a week sweet money, though the naughty ones were "suspended from the shop from one to six weeks, according to the crime" - presumably not by their ears - though such is the quirkiness of village life this is not impossible!

There are some people it is always a pleasure to meet and some books which have a charm all of their own. From one we have had the opportunity to acquire the other.

Dr Jack Ravensdale has been the inspiration for generations OF local historians; from his appearances in the "History on our doorstep" television series he achieved the recognition that his many years of teaching and researching, both in this country and Australia deserved. His 1974 study of the village landscape on the edge of the fens, "Liable to floods", reflected his love for the area around Cottenham, Waterbeach and his adopted village of Landbeach whilst his restoration of a home there features extensively in "The Domesday Inheritance". Sadly Jack will teach no more but his local materials are to be made available to others - and amongst them that most interesting volume "The reminiscences of Albert Pell", published in 1908 :

Pell recalls various aspects of life some 160 years ago in and around Wilburton. where his father was Lord of the Manor. The lad was impressed by the village pound, home for wandering cows, cunning donkeys and loose colts which had been rounded up by the Pindar. But whereas the donkeys stood stock still in the sunshine, and the cows chewed the cud placidly until kicked by the cart colt, it was the pigs that were the villains, causing their captor the most difficulty, especially at "shacking" time.

Human animals also needed restraining and for this there was the village cage, a square brick building with a narrow door adorned by auctioneers posters into which disruptive elements were imprisoned. One such was the village pest - some said he was an idiot, some that he was insane, some that he was devilish cunning. Short in stature, his tangled hair and deeply pitted pock-marked face was as dirty as his fingers whilst his eyes perpetually twinkled, except when they blazed with rage.

Dressed in home-made clothes - a kilt made from a corn sack and a jerkin fashioned from a calf-skin with the two joined together with a butcher's skewer - he was a hard drinker and when not brawling in the street would be engaged in some other mischief in the fields. From time to time patience snapped and burly residents dragged him back to the village and called out the constable. Without further ado - and without bothering the magistrates - he would be forced into the cage and locked up, a few children loitering around the door acting as warders.

On one occasion they came running with the message "He's been a-thumping the door and a-swearing and says he's not a-going to be kept in any longer - you can hear him 'scratting' like a rabbit". A crowd gathered to watch the jail break and were rewarded by the sight of two hands emerging from under the foundations; after a while a head, then bare shoulders followed and when the hips followed the onlookers ran off, only then sending for the constable. But he had gone off to milk his cow in some distant field and the village was left to the mercy of the "pest", who threatened vengeance if somebody did not bring him his jerkin - which was of course still securely locked up.

Few pounds or lock-ups survive today as reminders of the time when villagers had their own way of dealing with rogue elements, be they man or beast. But thanks to Jack Ravensdale thousands of us have much more appreciation of the history on our doorsteps.

Two views of winter now sit side by side on our new books shelves though published 100 years apart.

One is from "The Atlantic Monthly" which in 1893 carried an article entitled "The English Cambridge in winter" written by Albert Gillette Hyde who was obviously impressed with his memories of the winter of 1890-91 for he waxes lyrical about colleges under snow and "the stout but rather dissipated and rowdy-looking figure of bluff King Hall, over the fine old gateway of Trinity, wearing a most reverend and snowy beard", He continues in like vein describing the modern undergraduate on holidays "draped in the flowing white surplice redolent of sanctity", of clean asphalt streets and "shops lighted up brilliantly".

The blizzard - though of course a much milder version than the genuine American visitation - began on November 15, the cold snap lasted two months being the severest known for 70 years and making Cambridge the coldest place in the Kingdom. Despite it all the University did not suspend its functions, until the general exodus of Christmas when the town relapsed into a state of somnolence until the middle of January when the grads returned. Padded out with accounts of May week, quotes from poets and references to famous personages it gave his American readers some impression of a Cambridge that local people might have recognised,

Edward Storey, himself a poet, has perhaps achieved something similar in his latest hook "The winter fens", starting and ending with the arrival of the wild swans at Welney. In between he reprints sections from various books and recounts conversations with local people which are much more interesting. Jack Kerridge at Littleport, once a renowned local skater at a time when this might mean prizes of beef or mutton that would keep the family alive when there was no possibility of work on the land, recalled how men worked on the farm until four o'clock on Christmas Eve when they'd come to the farmhouse for a glass of whisky before going home to rooms decorated with paper chains and holly.

On Boxing Day most went off to compete in ploughing matches. Hugh Cave of Thorney recalls the winter of 1906—7 when the Wisbech Road was so blocked with snow that council men had to dig trenches for people to cross from one side of the village to the other, whilst gipsy Charlie Ashton recalled waking many a time with two inches of snow on his head.

This last memory is recounted on a series of tape recordings made by the Delanoy family of Haddenham which also features the late George Amory talking about the 1947 fen floods. "When the bank blowed at Over Fen it drowned all the Fen ... I went along that night, me and my wife, and we met Perse Allen. There was already a hole nearly thirty-foot long in the bank ... you could hear it roaring miles away, it filled up all the fen from Sutton to Stretham ... it were like a sea. We had more than ten feet of water on the land then. No, more than that, it must have been near fourteen feet with waves washing over tackle, out-buildings and the tops of bungalows."

The flood followed heavy February snow and devastated over 100 square miles of fen land but once the water had been pumped away the fenmen went back on the land

To me the best account of a fenman's winter comes from an unidentified 82 year old, "Years a-working on wet land, years of stooping over rows of taters in a biting wind, of getting wet through day after day until you thought you'd never bloody stand up straight again ... I used to go 'um some nights when my hands were that bloody cracked and swollen that I couldn't unlace my boots, The missus had to do that for me. Fifty-six years I worked on the land and a fat lot of thanks I got for it too. That's what I think about winter

Workwise Christmas comes in two stages. First there is the run up to the holiday itself, a time when most people have other things to do than undertake research or worry about their school or college project. Even the closure of the County Record Office for their annual stocktaking did not bring the additional enquiries we would otherwise expect. Once the break is over however then the rush begins, People who have vegetated over the turkey now want to get their minds in gear again, The Cambridge Evening News end-of-year quiz meant that our files of that newspaper were being perused day after day, there was little point in putting the bundles of papers away between enquirers,

Other people have taken the opportunity to have a sort-out at home and various items are brought in for addition to our files. From one envelope from Thetford in Norfolk came a bundle of sales particulars with the note "Thanks for your help". One was for a variety of properties in Burwell which had been offered for sale in 1892. No sooner did I bring this into the Collection than another reader gave me a copy of a similar item for the same place, this one dated 1866 and relating to the sale of the present Burwell House with its merchants yard opposite along with wharfs, warehouses and granaries.

From Worcester Library has come a scrapbook of cuttings and photos, including a snippet from the Daily Mail of July 1919 headlined "A modern gibbet" showing an effigy of Kaiser Bill swinging from the gallows at Caxton, whilst from a postcard album we have the opportunity to acquire several cards not previously in our stock, including a view of Sidney Street c1920, Another most welcome addition is a fine colour painting of the old cottages in Silver Street demolished by Queens' college in the 1930s.

If we can get so excited about a single picture think how the University must have felt when in 1834 they were presented with more than 280 oils, drawings and prints by various Dutch and Flemish painters. They arrived in twenty cases, brought by waggon during the summer of 1834 and were initially housed in a room in the Pitt Press in Trumpington Street, and named the Mesman Museum after the donor. Daniel Mesman was a member of a well-known Huguenot family of silk weavers but why he chose to leave his collection to Cambridge is far from clear. Although Viscount Fitzwilliam had bequeathed money in 1816 the museum named after him had not even been started and for the first few years Mesman's Museum was looked after by a former part-time butler at Queens' college. Then in 1848 it moved to its present home in the Fitzwilliam. Dr Basil Herbertson has recorded the story in a recent issue of the "Journal of the History of Collections", another of our Christmas donations.

But the most exciting thing brought in was one we could not keep. Nevertheless we drooled over it, we tried to read the spidery handwriting and decipher the abbreviated Latin script which recorded the activities of the Manor Court in Littleport many years ago. We tried to work out the date. We failed to make any sense of it, The fascinating bundle of documents had been rescued from destruction in a solicitors office some 50 years ago and was now offered for preservation in the County Record Office. Although closed for stocktaking the Archivists were delighted to be dragged away from their work to be told of this most exciting find and soon came down from Shire Hall to take it into their custody. We told them of our side-bet on the date and the answer came back -between between 13 and 13 . A truly wonderful Christmas gift to local researchers that we enjoyed helping ensure it found its permanent last resting place

Twice a month, on average, a new book will be published whose author acknowledges the assistance of the Cambridgeshire Collection in some way. Recently two of our local lady historians have chosen to feature a similar picture in their latest books, both depicting rod peeling for the basket making industry,

Sallie Purkis has selected a view of Joe Munsey's workers at Cottenham, formidable ladies each wearing hats, one of whom has a child with her, whilst their employer is shown at the back of the group. We are told that their job was to strip the bark off twigs which were then woven into baskets. Mary Abbott however in depicting the rod yard at Sutton Gault goes into much more detail. She records one woman's testimony that rod peeling was carried out in the springtime when the sap began to rise & the job lasted a month. When cut they were tied into bunches for transport to the yard, put in a big clamp and watered at night. To peel the rods they were drawn through a clave which bruised the rod to make it easier for peeling - but it was hard work and made the ladies' hands sore. The rods were separated at that time into large and small, dried & bunched up again for the basket maker. There was a big demand for skips for the fruit and potato trade. The fruit basket held 21 pound and the potato skip one hundredweight Harold Painter has recorded that pay varied between 2d and 2½ d per bundle and a good worker could prepare three bunches a day.

Mary Abbot, principal lecturer in history at Anglia Polytechnic University, comments further on the poses and clothing of the people depicted, the boss (probably Tom Norris) in the chair, his wife, who has no need of an apron to protect her clothes unlike the women workers, part of the largely invisible army of mature women who combined housekeeping with earning. Her book "Family Ties", examines the different ways of life of various classes of people between 1540 and 1920. Chapters on the families of landowners, farmers, the middle-class, and the labouring poor are each divided into sections such as infancy, childhood, the choice of wife, parenthood or marital breakdown so that one can compare and contrast attitudes to such topics. There are many fascinating details - whilst in 1888 the advertisers of Sunlight Soap emphasised that it allowed washing to be done with so little rubbing "that a girl of 12 or 13 could do a large wash without being tired", another contributor records how in their family soap was so precious that few boys and girls under twelve ventured to touch it even for the most lawful purposes without express permission, whilst to 'borrow a rub' of it to make bubbles was a piece of daring that few children would dare to commit.

Sallie Purkis, writing for a much younger readership, also uses local examples such as a photograph of the servants at Melbourn Bury, posed alongside the members of the Fordham family who were present on Census night, 1891. Elizabeth Turtlebury was at 13 the youngest housemaid and domestic in the household having come into service from her home at Thriplow, whilst a picture of an old-fashioned mangle encourages the young historians to speculate on her way of life, as compared to that of her mistress, Catherine Fordham, who aged 52 was a widow living on her own income – precisely the questions answered by Mary Abbot

Although most enquirers in the Cambridgeshire Collection have their own specific area of interest - the date of the tress at the bottom of their garden, a selection of photographs of Pembroke college, details of a local company with whom they have a job interview there are also a range of local projects being undertaken by various schools and colleges.

Recently we have started to compile selected lists of books, newspaper cuttings files and even illustrations on topics such as Cambridge railway station, Sturton Street and Park and Ride. Now it seems that old faithful project, the redevelopment of the Lion Yard, is once more on somebody's teaching schedules. The proposals seems to date back to the Holford report of 1949 which sparked considerable debate and disagreement between town and county authorities, Cambridge had lost its planning powers to the county under the 1947 Town and Country Planning Act and the County had appointed Holford as its consultant. When after two years the report was presented to the Borough for consideration there were complaints that they had not been consulted during its preparation and certainly disagreed with various of the proposals. It was perhaps typical that the Cambridge Daily News report managed to miss the single word "out" from one suggestion "it is possible to sort the traffic problems with(out) widening the ancient streets throughout". Holford felt that the historical centre should be pedestrianised but would be unable to meet increasing shopping needs, so he proposed a new shopping area in Fitzroy street.

The whole debate was aired at the County Development Plan inquiry in 1952. Although the need for a central car park was agreed, new proposals for two large shopping streets in the Lion Yard were rejected and another plan in 1959 met a similar fate. However that year the City voted to go ahead with a giant redevelopment scheme described as "the biggest yet in England if we omit the blitzed cities". The University objected and in 1960 the Minister rejected the idea.

Two years later an inquiry found the University favouring a cultural Lion Yard to include a new library, art gallery and concert hall with the commercial development in the Kite area. The County opposed the concert hall and the city wanted principally shops. By 1966 the city's plans were agreed but then the Government blocked funding and it was not until 1970 that work on the car park finally started. The demolition of the south side of Petty Cury followed in 1972 to create a massive building site on which the new Lion Yard shopping centre arose, finally opened in 1975.

Now there are proposals for a second stage with additional shops and development over the Heidelberg Garden - the roof-garden which is one of Cambridge's best-kept secrets

It is complicated enough to try and sort out the tangle of development proposals but what of the streets that disappeared under the bulldozer. Was it Alexandra Street or Falcon Yard that housed the YMCA, and which one had the gallery over it, where was St Tibbs Row & what shops used to stand where. By one of those strange co-incidences that seem to happen regularly, this week we have been given two separate sets of transparencies. Whether Messrs Pittock and Durkering actual knew each other is doubtful but they seemed to follow each other round to record scenes which will revive memories for some but are ancient history to others

Sir Cornelius Vermuyden, the Dutch engineer whose name is inevitably linked to the drainage of the fenlands, was also responsible for work elsewhere, including Hatfield Chace and the Isle of Axholme. Although it ultimately bought him fame it also brought controversy with other engineers disputing the solutions he proposed, various misjudgements, failures and the expensive mistakes leading him into debt and into prison. The troubled sage of his life was told in a book by J. Korthals-Altes first published in 1925 which has been unobtainable for many years and now reissued in a very limited facsimile edition of 100 copies, one of which we have acquired.

It includes some of the verses were penned at the time by fenmen opposed to the changes

"Why should we stay here and perish with thirst;
To th' new world in the moon away let us goe,
For if the Dutch colony get thither first,
Tis a thousand to one but they'll drain that too"

One of Vermuyden's supporters was Samuel Fortrey of Mepal who is thought to be the author of a tract on the History of the Great Level published in 1685 - another new acquisition - which includes verses supporting the drainers activities

"Go on, Brave Undertakers, and Succeed,
In spite of Brutish clamours, take no heed
To those that curse your Generous labours

He envisaged the new banks standing like the immoral pyramids and the critics confounded.

But the real fen poet was William Harrison born in 1794 at Pymore, educated at Lt Downham, who in 1831 was encouraged to apply for the post of drainage Superintendent at Burnt Fen. Although he admitted he knew nothing of what was required he got the job and went on to serve loyally for 40 years during the period when drainage technology was undergoing tremendous change with the old windmills, which could only operate when the wind blew, being replaced by the might of steam.

But it was the fame of Harrison the poet which brought over 400 people to the Ely reading room in February 1873, the year after his death. The speaker William Marshall told the audience of the vast amount of poetry Harrison had penned and for two hours read a selection of his verses. They covered many topics - from the tale of Tom Young who had a beer house at Welches Dam and came to grief following the death of his first wife –

"And if she was as good a mate
As husband ever had,
His next to make the world go straight,
Perhaps was just as bad".

When threatened with eviction Tom turned his cottage into a castle and defied the bailiffs, who in turn starved him from his home;

"His dying frame was cast
On damp and rugged fishing nets,
And there he breathed his last".

After Marshall's talk people were determined that Harrison's poems should be brought together and published, rather than leave them scattered in newspaper columns or Magazines. Sadly their enthusiasm came to nothing and his name is largely forgotten, Now however a Scottish lady is seeking to bring it together and has sent us a copy of one of his earliest poems, written in 1814.

"Clod's Complaint" laments the end of the Napoleonic Wars which would allow cheap imports of corn and ruin local farmers.

"When war throughout all Europe reigned, we farmers lived in clover,
But now the friendly fiend is chained, our golden age is over",

The poem calls for another tyrant to arise –
"Grant, o Fate, 'ere 'tis too late, when men have had a blowing, War may revive, that we may thrive, and corn may pay for growing".

His concerns were real for two years later the men of Littleport rioted against just such conditions and were hanged for their trouble,

A donation of postcards has this week reawakened memories of forgotten traditions. One such was Empire Day which on 24th May 1907 the County Boys School in Hills Road celebrated in traditional manner: all of the scholars assembled to salute the Union Jack and the Cadet Corps fired a salute. In the afternoon the pupils gathered for a thanksgiving service opened with the singing of the National Anthem. The President of Queens' college then gave an address urging the boys to honour all men and love the brotherhood. They must do their part for the Empire Day movement and see that everything honourable true & pure should abound there and flourish, and whatever was mean, low and cursed they should stamp out. All this drew applause from the young audience. Then came the award of prizes for the best essay on the subject "The British Empire; its foundation, development and maintenance" which were won by Herbert and Robert Mayo. Elsewhere other schools marked the occasion in a similar patriotic manner,

In the evening a fancy dress procession took place with children on gaily decorated cycles and thousands of people thronged the streets to witness the spectacle. Amongst the participants was Gwennie Strange of the George Hotel who represented "India" in a costume of rich orange with a gold-braided turban and won the first prize of a gold necklet. Jessie Strange, attired as a courtier of the reign of Charles II, came second receiving a silver-plated preserve dish which had been presented by Matthews & company whilst other girls were dressed in Japanese.. Italian and Irish style,. First amongst the gentlemen was Archie Ellis of City Road representing the Post Office with coat and trousers covered with postage stamp whilst Charles Bennett of Oxford Road, dressed as a sailor, came second.

The proceedings were snapped by Joseph Henry Priest who issued a postcard view, one of those brought in. By good fortune we had some years earlier been given some 300 of Priest's glass negatives and were able to now match negative to postcard and take the opportunity of looking up the details in the Cambridge Chronicle newspaper of that year.

Another of the cards was also dated 1909 but shows another side of Cambridge life, as forgotten now as Empire Day - the Wooden spoon, This was traditionally awarded to the undergraduate who came lowest in the Mathematical tripos and although it probably started as an ordinary kitchen spoon it grew into a much more glorious object four or five feet long which was lowered from the Senate House galleries by undergraduates as the recipient approached the Vice Chancellor to be admitted to his degree. It was ornately painted with the arms of the winner's college, his name and the date - rather like an oar won in the May Races. In fact, the handle of the last, spoon awarded to C.L Holthouse of St John's college in 1909 was actually made of an oar-blade. It is now preserved in St John's college. The ceremony stopped when the class-lists stopped being printed in order of merit.

Less attractive Cambridge traditions included the Guy Fawkes night disturbances when students built bonfires of whatever would burn, ransacking garden fences for the purpose, Frank Keene issued a cartoon card in 1905 depicting the resistance of one Cambridge lady to the mob seeking to take her fence to fuel their blaze - "I'll give yer more wood" she cries, swinging her broomstick in the direction of undergraduate heads.

From Queensland Australia has come an account of the Cross family who emigrated from the Ely area in the 1950s. Pam McClymont traces her ancestry back to John and Elizabeth Cross who had ten children between 1761 and 1789 and includes many details of subsequent members of the family and their descendents - very-interesting to those involved, less riveting for others. However in 1855 George, his wife Julia and six children decided to leave their home at Prickwillow to make the long journey to Australia. Extracts from Julia's letters indicate something of the hardship of the journey,

They set sail from Southampton in November 1855, cheering as they left dockside but soon suffering as the "James Fernie" heaved and rolled upon the ocean; then after three days of seasickness "a violent storm came on the water and flew over the ship and we were rocked about, up went our heels and down went our heads as we lay in the bed we quite thought it was all up for us". But this they were assured was nothing special. It continued very rough until they got to the Bay of Biscay, but by then they were acclimatised.

But there were other problems - the noise of the other 440 passengers half of them Irish - was like the inside of a railway carriage, making eating an endurance "for if I don't have peace and quietness my food never does me any good" - so when possible she took her boiled rice, boiled beef, potatoes and onion on deck.

On and on and on and on the voyage took. On 5th December they passed the Cape of Good Hope - "hope that is more than halfway", but they were making good progress "and we have not, had one die yet - and the last voyage this ship made to the same place they lost 37 ... but the Doctor is so particular else we should be as bad now for the Irish are so dirty ... but the Doctor will not let them have any dinner till their places are all clean". Christmas Day brought plum pudding and the alarm of fire - some thought caused by the Irish who were always smoking, even in their beds - but in fact through a baker's stove overheating - "the screams of some of them was beyond what you can conceive".

At last they sighted land - and two rocks, one called Sugar Loaf and the other the shape of Castle Hill, Cambridge but much larger. They docked at Moreton Bay, North Brisbane on 24th January 1856. There was to be a second voyage of fourteen days but now there was no shortage of food - "we have fresh beef and mutton and bread brought from Brisbane - as good Beef and mutton as ever I eat in England - I wish you now had the meat that we and many more are obliged to fling overboard for we really cannot eat it all." They also enjoyed delicacies - pineapples, lemons and pumpkins of all sorts, apples, walnuts and crabs. This must have prompted the families back home in the fens to consider their own position.

But- when the Crosses reached their new home it was not everything they could wish with temperatures of 35 degrees and millions upon millions of gants - "they bite you dreadful, all the parts of your flesh that is uncovered, of a night in the morning it will be exactly like small pox ... we got cow dung and smoked them out of the tent. I sleep in gloves and the children's hands in their nightgowns and I sew a handkerchief about their heads of a night".

Nevertheless, they were hardy folk, Julia then 36, her husband 42. and two years later they had another daughter. Having lived near Queen Adelaide, Ely they settled near Brisbane and, as Pamela McClymont records, they thrived,

One recent enquiry was from somebody who was trying to locate the grave of her uncle. He had been one of those men of Cambridgeshire whose war-time exploits had resulted in the arrival of their ship at Singapore on 19th January 1942. They had come to support the troops fighting the Japanese in Malaya, troops who had already been pressed back further and further by the might of the enemy army and air-force, The Royal Navy battleships "Prince of Wales" and "Repulse" had already been sunk as the seemingly unstoppable Japanese forces made their way down the length of the country smashing their way through Indian and Australian forces as they did so,

The island of Singapore was to be the final showdown. As more and more stragglers arrived the numbers of troops swelled, but their position was desperate. Just after 8 o'clock on the morning of 31st January 1942 the last men marched across the causeway which linked it to the mainland and engineers detonated charges to produce a four foot gap separating themselves from some 130,000 Japanese infantry with some 200 planes, 150 tanks and artillery.

Amongst those facing them were the Cambridgeshire's who had disembarked from their troop ship just days earlier, unacclimatised to the heat and deprivations of an island just 20 miles long whose water supply had been destroyed along with the causeway. Ammunition was quickly expended, food and petrol ran out whilst bombers attacked hour by hour spilling bombs like confetti, amongst the demoralised defenders. Despite defiant messages from Commanders safely ensconced in Ceylon the outcome was without doubt, Of the 65,000 Allied service men and women who were capture some 30,000 were British, 20,000 of them untrained, unarmed or non-combatants.

For the survivors the nightmare was just beginning. Arthur Lane was one of these and he recounts what happened next - the forced marches, inhuman treatment, slave labour and starvation diet which allied to the unrelenting climate and lack of basic medical supplies left thousands of bodies alongside the railway that was constructed into Thailand and across the River Kwai. By the end of the war less than half of those who had surrendered at Singapore were alive and 23,000 of those who died have no known grave.

Fifty years later Lane went back to visit again places such as Three Pagoda Pass, Niki-Niki, Chungkai and other sites whose names conjure up in the mind some form of tropical paradise but which were in fact stopping places to Hell. The second part of his book recounts his adventures and includes 200 colour photographs including hidden railway locomotives, ruined bridges and tropical scenery where local men laboured and died. He recounts his attempts to track down missing cemeteries and of a visit to one such site where there was evidence of recent excavations and a nearby souvenir shop had for sale a soldier's cap badge, gold ring and Swan pen - but whose owner would not allow him to inspect the contents of some black bags at the rear of her shop - bags it was suspected contained British prisoners' bones.

The third part of the book is perhaps the most harrowing - over 240 pages of lists of names of those British killed in action or subsequently worked to death. Yet this is incomplete - to have included the Australians, Canadian, Dutch. Indian and Chinese forces would have demanded a further 150 pages

'When you go home' by Arthur Lane is published by A. Lane publications of 61 Charles Street, Stockport at £35. All receipts are donated to the Soldiers, Sailors and Airmen Family Association in the name of former colleagues

Reflections on the past are nothing new. In 1912 Edward Conybeare, one-time vicar of Barrington, contributed an article to the magazine "Arena" in which he reflected on "Cambridge fifty years ago". In it he drew attention to various changes that somebody who - like him - had been at Trinity College in 1862 who notice were he to return to his old Alma Mater,

The sight of women in the University Library (still of course beside the Senate House in 1912) would have shocked him - in 1862 never a petticoat invaded those sacred precincts - although they were only allowed to sit in the Ladies Room. Perhaps the visitor might have noticed the newness of one of the balls on Clare college bridge - a replacement for one stolen by St John's undergraduates and dropped into the river, sinking too deeply into the ooze to be recovered. This would not have been a viable proposition in 1862 since the Colleges along that section of the river discharged their sewage directly into the water, Conybeare claimed however that the University was not the only culprit for the Town's waste entered the Cam at Barnwell pool causing "an expanse of pestiferous bubbling slime" which was stirred up by the oars of the college boats making rowing "an unspeakably nauseating experience"

Other changes were the window boxes at Trinity, the electric light in college rooms, replacing the old "moderator" lamps which had burned colza oil which had needed to be pumped into the wick with infinite trouble.

To illustrate his article Conybeare included a number of "then and now" pictures, two of which have recently been issued as postcards by the Cambridgeshire Collection. They include the famous view of Market Hill from the entrance to Petty Cury with the patient male onlookers marvelling at the sight of the photographer well recorded but the bustling woman making a blurred image on the negative. Then there is Sidney Street, also in about 1862 looking virtually unchanged except for the cobblestones and of course the costume.

Conybeare would also have recognised some of the other scenes - the bustle of Market Day about 1905, the flags flying in Petty Cury for the 1911 Coronation - though the sight of the Lion Hotel and the shops demolished for the present Lion Yard will cause considerable puzzlement to people whose memories of Cambridge do not extend back beyond the 1970s.

Somewhat more up to date is a view of Bridge Street showing Allin's garage on the right with queues of cars and the traffic lights which controlled the junction with St. John's street, Taken in 1937 the card also shows the shops demolished by St John's college for its Music school, making the street seem considerably narrower than today,

For those with an interest in photography it is a fascinating exercise to locate the spot where the original photographer stood and take a modern view. One will however completely defeat them, for to get an exact match of the view of Central Cambridge in 1905, one would need to shin up the spire of Holy Trinity church and sit on the weathercock, That done the scene would seem to have changed very-little - the fountain has been removed from the centre of the Market (though it may come back as part of the present plans to revamp the area), the hansom cabs have disappeared, as have the tramlines in St Mary's street. Otherwise the area is as familiar today as it was to Conybeare in 1912 and to his 1862 companion. We wait and see what the future will hold,

Why give talks? There are certainly times when I wonder whether it is worth driving far along some country road in heavy rain searching for a village hall where perhaps a dozen people might fill the time between the business meeting and coffee to hear about the work of the Cambridgeshire Collection (dressed up as "Old Cambridgeshire past and present").

Heading towards the Welney wildfowl refuge recently it was not rain but fog which confronted us but at least there was the prospect of witnessing the floodlit feeding of thousands of swans from the comfort of their hide and listening to the commentary given over his radio microphone by the man wheeling the barrow and scattering the corn. Then returning to the well-equipped Visitor Centre we find the car park full and, as if from nowhere, over 60 people have braved the elements to learn how others battled far worse conditions to fight the fen floods of 1947

Every talk brings some benefit to the Collection. Thus after speaking on "Sherlock Holmes in Cambridge" one of the audience showed me some newly-discovered drawings of Cambridge scenes made over 150 years ago and now come to light in a Worcester Museum. We have since been in contact and with luck might have something else to report soon:

Just occasionally the results are even more immediate. It had been a particularly fraught day and the prospect of running through the "Webbed feet to green wellies" slides yet again was less than appealing. But to be greeted with a packed church hall and a warm welcome gave the boost one needs to keep going - together with the prospect of examining the postcards that the congregation had collected to donate to the library.

They were a mixed bag, some immediately recognisable, others that need puzzling over and still more than we need help in identifying. Amongst the first category is a view of the last of the horse-trams in 1914. Were the crowds on the upper-deck actually typical of the numbers that used the tram then this would account for the proverbial slowness of this mode of transport - and bring accusations of cruelty from the horse lobby. The problems that finally signalled its demise was the expense of maintaining roads which had tram-lines down the middle

More adventurous travel is represented by the Beta II airship seen leaving Jesus Green during the army manoeuvres of 1912. The exercises were designed to test the country's ability to repel invasion by enemy forces and took place over a wide area. They were masterminded by Sir John French, who had earlier spent time at Trinity college planning a paper war involving thousands of troops and featured the leading Generals of the day, including Sir Douglas Haig who commanded the invading army with its airship.

It was a case of fact following fiction for in 1909 there had been rumours that a flag found on Midsummer Common had been dropped from a German airship and that a landing on Parker's Piece might be attempted. If so they might have been arrested for illegal parking by Cambridge police, a contingent of whom is pictured complete with medals, presumably just post-war. Also liable to arrest might be some of the male bathers whose costumes emphasise why the sexes were segregated in their bathing sheds on the Cam whilst another snap records lady swimmers posing alongside the Mayor - research should at least reveal his name and thus give some clue to the date. We will put the pictures on display in the Heritage Showcase and somebody will identify them - just as others assist by turning out to listen to our talks and reward us with their donations and - most-importantly - support,

Each month over 300 local magazines, periodicals and journals arrive in the Collection; they come from a variety of societies - Scouts and Guides, churches and chapels, villages and political parties and reflect the modern county as seen from the perspective of that particular group. They thus complement and supplement the views published in local newspapers.

Some are duplicated, others printed & carry a mixture of news, feature articles, pictures and advertisements. One such is "Cambridge", the magazine of the Cambridge Society whose Winter 1993-1994 issue has just arrived in my pile, The Society is open to all members of the University and has branches around the country and across the globe, its magazine aims to keep them informed of developments and carries a wide range of articles

Many of these are serious and authoritative - the Vice Chancellor's address to the Regent House, the formation of a Historic Buildings Group or suggestions of a new role for education in the Economic Community - but there are also a good number of eminently readable "historical" articles; several of which feature food

The role of the University Library in a time of change is the subject of a most thoughtful paper by Dr Ratcliffe, its Librarian who will retire this year. One of the Copyright Deposit Libraries the building on West Road houses millions of books and is planning various expansions to provide space for them. But changes in modern technology means that more and more information is being produced, not in book form, but on computer disc. The University Library has embraced the technology to assist it in keeping up with accessions but - as with the Cambridgeshire Collection - no machine can completely assist in meeting the demands of increasing users for increasing numbers of items. However there is another side to the job of University Librarian, as is indicated in the next article. This is the attendance at various College Feasts and dinners & Dr Ratcliffe has collected the menu cards to add to the treasures in his Library. Few meals however can have attracted more attention than that at Sidney Sussex college in March 1869 when dons decided they would like to experiment with a new delicacy - donkey. Accordingly a six-year old animal called Edward was fattened with oil cake on Mr Langton's farm at Trumpington & visited daily by senior academics who watched his weight-growth with satisfaction. Joints were sent to Corpus and Trinity colleges and the opinions recorded: "liver superior to that of calf" ,, "it was delicious ... like venison" ... "vastly superior to horse but also above beef", Why, one wonders, did the Editor choose to follow this article with an advertisement from one of Cambridge's top restaurants?

Food features elsewhere throughout the magazine. In an account of early Victorian ladies in Cambridge there is an account of a garden party at Trinity in 1842, with a band hidden under the trees and guests enjoying a handsome cold dinner with profusion of champagne, then came quadrilles, waives and country-dances followed by 4 separate tea-parties in different parts of the grounds, Tchaikovsky ("rather fat and getting bald") was entertained to richer fare when he visited Cambridge to receive his Honorary Degree in 1893, For him it was a seven-course banquet at King's college including salmon and whitebait, saddle of lamb with artichoke hearts Italian style, duckling, vanilla soufflé & champagne ice cream with fruit. Elsewhere a Girton girl reminisces about the college feast organised to celebrate VE day 1945. They ate soup not made from Symington's Soup Powder, almost-forgotten chicken followed by, astonishingly, ice cream and washed it down with half a glass of cider (though the High Table had wine they noticed)

If all this leaves members hungry they can always avail themselves of hand-made luxury chocolates with fresh cream centres available by mail order for just £12.75 per lb box - one of the benefits of membership along with an interesting Magazine # c.28

I am no engineer and have no firm grasp on technology. Thus when somebody tells me that photographs can be scanned on to a computer, that faults can be magicked away, images enhanced and that it can all then be printed out as good as a proper photograph but in a fraction of the time I can appreciate the benefits and realise the potential for a Collection such as ours which has over 400,000 images, most in the form of negatives, but have no idea how it's possible.

But then being realistic about it we have very little chance of acquiring such technology before the next developments come along and make it out of date, though our village primary school could do it on the machinery they have now. Impending obsolescence make a good excuse not to do anything anyway.

I am equally baffled by the expertise of the engineers who can understand the intricacies of Victorian machinery, When they talk of installing an Electric Drive at Stretham Old Engine so that the mighty scoop wheel might move once more I can only marvel. Talk of condensers and reciprocating wots-its send me reaching for the children's guide to steam engines. How then am I to appreciate some of the photographs we have just received via the University of East Anglia. They include interior views of the steam pumping engine erected in 1855 by the Duke of Bedford for water supply and sewage disposal on his Thorney Estate and of a new oil engine installed somewhere in the fen in 1936 .

I am more at home with the concept of windpumps to drain the fen, one of which is featured in another photograph. By then it had been turned into a house and from a completely different source we have recently received a photograph of the interior of one such converted mill

Some of the photographs are so strong they tell the story without words. Thus a lady tries to sweep water away from her house during the floods of Spring 1937 whilst rivermen patrol the banks near Denver Sluice - which could not be opened to let the pent-up river water out because of high tides in the Wash. Maintaining communication between river bank and drainage HQ was only possible by the use of the army signallers and their wireless transmitters, one of whom is pictured at Welches Dam, whilst nearer home water floods across the A10 at Stretham bridge. Students from Girton College were taken out to Earith in 1937 to watch what was believed to have been a unique sight, now it has been overshadowed by the greater- flooding of ten years later.

Reflections 1994 03 30

One of the things that gives us most satisfaction is to see the excitement experienced by somebody who has researched a topic for a considerable time when he discovers something new. Thus recently a couple from Markyate in Bedfordshire popped into the Cambridgeshire Collection whilst visiting a Book Fair at the Guildhall, They had done so after spotting a book of photographs by Ted Mott - and Mott had once lived in their village. Was there any chance there might be Markyate negatives amongst his collection. Indeed there are, they returned on a special visit and had a most enjoyable time.

Just occasionally one can experience the excitement personally. I started this year by doing something I had never done before - visiting the weathercock on the top of our church spire and seeing the village in a whole new way. This was possible only because the steeple was swathed in scaffolding whilst extensive renovation work was taking place. Now the work is complete and the weathercock lonely once more. A week or so later I visited the village school to show the photographs I'd taken and was shown a picture of somebody else talking to the cockerel, though this time the wooden planking on which they were standing was far less-extensive and the picture was obviously several decades old. So when had it been taken? A village resident recalled men repairing the steeple when she was a girl, but there was no definite information to go on and a new mystery had been created.

About a month later a reader donated a copy of a small history of Stretham written by the Rector in 1922, and well-known within the village, indeed it has been reissued and is currently on sale to raise money for repairs. A second glance however revealed something different for the back cover carries a photograph very similar to the school discovery and inside a whole page has been added recording the need for repairs which came to light whilst Mr Pope was attending the flowers in the churchyard and heard a mighty crash of falling masonry within the tower, £350 needed to be found to pay the steeplejacks and the pamphlet was reissued in 1928 to help meet the costs. Presumably most village people had already got a copy of the earlier edition for I had never-seen this reprint.

The rest of the text is as before including the account of the village cross which formerly had a flight of stone steps which were removed to commemorate Queen Victoria's Jubilee, though whether of 1887 or 1897 is not mentioned. Then came the next discovery.

We had learned that a museum in Worcester had a collection of sketches of Cambridgeshire which had not been previously issued and written accordingly. The reply arrived one Saturday afternoon and I glanced inside the envelope. Amongst the photocopies was a view of Stretham church and cross instantly recognisable though on second glance very different. The spire and tower are the same: but the rest of the church shows the structure "restored" by the Victorians in the 1870s. A local leans on the farmgate leading into the churchyard, two others rest against the base of the cross - the same circular base that still stands. Yet the sketch is dated 1837 - before Victoria's coronation, let alone her Jubilee. Thus village history needs to be rewritten as a result of one man's sketch,

The Worcester collection includes 124 other sketches and prints of local churches some well-known others unique and they have send photocopies of many. There are busy times ahead for them as researchers arrange visits to view this most exciting collection

Tuesday was the evening I got lost driving from Cambridge to Comberton. It was particularly annoying as earlier that day I had managed to locate Queen Edith's Junior School without a map - and by only having to ask one passer-by. But later - even with the Ordnance Survey sheet - the village vanished. The journey had started with a diversion to Harston to collect a scrapbook from an address in Button End. The street was found but what I'd forgotten was how many lampposts needed to be counted before the right house came into view, once more local assistance was needed to track it down,

Local people will always know more about their locality than any outsider, Some village histories are written by Professional Historians who know Latin and can decipher documents but cannot find their way down the High Street without a map, Others are compiled by people who may have no academic training but a lifetime of knowledge

The sources that researchers can use will similarly vary, thus one donation has been pamphlets from the collection of one of the country's finest historical geographers. Amongst the items contained in the four boxes are a number of articles published in a most diverse range of periodicals. Who would expect to find material on the fen land in such titles as "Countryman" Autumn 1954 - (claying the fens), "Geographical Journal" January 1934 (extinct waterways), "Journal of the History of Medicine" July 1979 (Opium eating), or track down the 1937 volume of the "Journal of the Royal Agricultural Society of England" for something on farm organisation on the black fens of the Isle of Ely. In fact we had these in the Collection already, but then we have been seeking and collecting for nearly 140 years. Nevertheless there were other items we had missed completely, including some early pamphlets,

The Harston scrapbook also has a range of material including programmes of performances of Gilbert & Sullivan by the village Musical society in 1934 - a Society whose reputation was such that it was mentioned on the wireless. Harston's local history productions - represented by the programme of a Pageant in 1924 - were so good that Cambridge police begged the village to keep them up as they drew so many young people from the streets and gave Cambridge a bit of peace.

The cuttings and photographs are enlivened by little details that only village folk would know. Thus one local lad became postillion to Queen Victoria and King Edward VII, another sang in front of King Edward VII who, when up at University, had visited the village shop for a packet of cigarettes, whilst one Harston resident kept reindeers as pets. It even includes the text of Canon Baldwin's farewell address in 1924 in which he laments the poor congregations attending his church and the excuses given by parishioners. He accuses them of indulging in wicked and unclean talk and delighting in picking holes in the characters of the good, There is a photograph of the Canon and his wife who we are told was irreverently called the "Fish Mare" and a note of how village maidens were commanded to curtsy to her in the street, though one brave girl refused having been told by her father to curtsy to nobody but the Queen, The vicar condemns parents for allowing their children to grow up in dread of them and for failing to impart religious teaching, However when Reuben Segrave drove his hoop into the Vicarage Gardens and accidentally knocked down one of the Canon's children he was hauled before the courts and, at Canon Baldwin's instigation, given the birch

Booklets of reflections continue to be published, each one offering a unique glimpse of the past through the eyes of the people who witnessed it at first hand.

From Steeple Morden comes the reminiscences of Herbert Ilett. Born in 1914 in a cottage that still stands and living in the village to this day he provides a fascinating account of the people and trades that went to make up the community during the first half of the century. In those days it seemed the sky always seemed to be blue and the grass brown in the heat of the sun - but in those days of hardship men trapped birds with a net to send to London markets, trapped moles for their fur and rabbits and hares for their meat. Children would crowd into the cobblers shop on Winter nights to watch the craftsman at work whilst some of the older boys would catch a sparrow from the thatch of one of the village houses and release it indoors whence it flew into the oil lamp hanging from the ceiling and caused great confusion - and doubtless much unpleasant - and fortunately unrecorded - language

Herbert earned money after school by minding the cows which grazed grass verges, and in the mornings on a milk round where he earned 5/- (25p) for a seven day week, After leaving school aged 14 he became a butchers boy working a twelve or fourteen hour day since customers had no refrigerators and no one wanted their meat delivered until Saturday, Then he started lorry driving until called-up for the War and returned to his trade afterwards, He married in 1934 living in a railway carriage at Ashwell station before moving to Steeple Morden to a house with cold running water, a bucket toilet but a large garden in which to empty it.

"Old Frank" lived in a village on the edge of the fen; now aged 88, he had moved his double bed down to the front room - rarely used now the family had grown up and left home. The wind would send cold draughts under the badly fitting front door and necessitate a walk down the yard past the coal shed to find a suitable sack. No-one used the front door in any case, only for funerals - and his would be the next. The only time they had a fire in the open grate was at the Village Feast Sunday tea or Christmas so mildew was always present and could be seen at the base of the walls. The cottage itself was at the bottom of the road which sloped down to the church and in heavy rain the water seeped over the low front step and into the room, leaving the edge of the carpet slightly stained and partly rotten,

It is a privilege to read Ernie Papworth's tribute to his father for every page invokes memories and brings the everyday life of a past generation vividly into focus. Stiff white collars, lumbago eased with embrocation and having his bark ironed with brown paper ... the dockey-bag ... flock mattresses which had to be juggled and arranged until each bump fitted an appropriate part of the body ... Old Frank loved his old village and had no wish to live elsewhere - you could take him out of his village, but you could never take the village out of him

Old Frank was an ordinary man. Pat an ordinary woman, living an ordinary life, working part-time as a cashier at Sainsbury's, singing in the choir at Cherry Hinton church and taking part in the 1933 Spring Concert given by Chesterton Choral Society. She died of breast cancer in July 1993 and her husband. Charles Hamilton, has now published "Crescent Moon" a tribute to her in a volume of poetry which charts the progress of the disease and the bereavement that followed, "You never write a poem for me", You said it sadly, wistfully ... but now he has in the hope that it might comfort others suffering the same feelings of loss and despair at a time when memories seem all there is to live for - and the memories are painful.

"A villager's life" by Herbery Godfrey Ilett, published by Mervyn Thompson creative enterprises - 26 Bogs Gap Lane, Steeple Morden "Old Frank" by E,S, Papworth 25 Station Rd. Over, "Crescent Moon" by Charles F. Hamilton co Sheila Watson, Arthur Rank House.

Somewhere about 25 years ago we started to index the volumes of the "Cambridge Chronicle" newspaper, beginning in 1770. By 1975 much of the Cambridgeshire news advertisements and court cases had been listed on catalogue cards covering events up to 1820, Since then teams of volunteers have turned their attention to the later years ; concentrating just on the village news columns which are now indexed up to 1900

Whilst indexing continues other enthusiasts have turned their attention to transcribing the stories discovered, several of which have now been published. This month it is the turn of Elsworth to have their own record of life in "the good old days" between 1770 and 1900 when the Swavesey and District Local History Society issue the fourth in a series covering their area.

Browsing through its pages makes fascinating reading, especially for anybody with any connection with either village. Yet the stories recorded give an awful impression of the hardships of the period and the struggles of ordinary people against the problems of their world which will interest everybody.

They will encounter the expected mix of tragedy and trivia - a baby thrown down a well to drown; a baker absconding in 1808 - he has a peculiar way of winking with his eye, readers are told, a missing earring is found in the crop of a hen which tried to fly over a well and failed, and the pub burns down in 1880,

The 1840s and 50s were a particular period of hardship and horror with incendiarism striking the farms of Mr Francis at Knapwell in 1848 and Mr Webbe of Elsworth in 1851; five families gave up the struggle and emigrated to America whilst two more left for Australia in 1853. Meanwhile people stole to survive, a sheep is found slaughtered and the Elsworth baker having suffered from a number of thefts hides a man in his cart under some sack s - the young would-be thief getting a surprise and a threshing for his pains. Papworth's mill burnt down in February 1884 and the harvest proves disappointing, especially for potatoes on which the poor man depended. Cholera struck in October causing violent sickness and cramp from which the victim died whilst Mary Holben, a widow, begged opium from a neighbour to help her cope with a pain in the chest which the usual remedy of ginger and water had failed to shift and met the same fate.

On the lighter side there is the story of the balloon which drifted over Elsworth in August 1879. Old and young made off to the fields, some of the old ones going almost as though training for a six days contest. The balloon came to rest in a hedge having travelled from Bedford in about an hour. The correspondent was tempted to recall a previous visit of one of these monster s when an old woman who had used crutches for a long time, ran some distance across the fields towards Hilton before she found out she had left them behind!

There are battles to maintain the church fabric - with the congregation continuing to meet for worship despite the rain falling through the roofless building and between church and chapel, the paper taking great delight in retailing a scandal regarding the nonconformist minister, the dissenters trying to block a parish rate to repair the church and baptising by immersion in the village brook in which a child was later drowned - the Coroner urging that it be fenced to prevent similar incidents .

One story at least is destined to repeat itself for in December 1900 the schoolroom was filled with an attentive & and appreciative audience for an entertainment using lantern slides - and the book will be launched in such manner at Ellsworth on April 26th with readings and slides

People research a wide range of topics some of which are reflected in four new publications to arrive in the Cambridgeshire Collection.

Casual observation of the birds in our garden seems to show a significant fall in the number of Song Thrushes, though for the first time this morning we noticed a Pied wagtail strutting around on the lawn. The new Atlas of the Breeding Birds in Cambridgeshire confirms that thrushes are in decline with the numbers ringed at Wicken Fen dropping from 80-100 to around 50 and as low as 16 in 1991. Overall it would appear to be breeding in 72% of the county, compared to 92% in Huntingdonshire and 96% of Norfolk, although their surveys were made some years ago. This may reflect a nationwide decrease or might be accounted for by the fact that some 30% of our county is open fenland farms which is inhospitable territory for birds, The Atlas identifies breeding areas and illustrates and comments on the various species. My Pied-Wagtail is widely distributed, breeding near farms or alongside fenland droves, although it is less common around Ely than the Yellow Wagtail - which has not seemed to discover our garden yet!

Others are more concerned with breeding people, with hundreds actively pursuing the search for their ancestors. For them the new guide to Genealogical Sources in Cambridgeshire compiled by Michael Farrar who has recently retired as County Archivist will prove an invaluable aid. For every parish it records the files of Church Registers available, together with notes on Monumental Inscriptions and transcripts of gravestones which have been compiled, the location of census records or Land tax assessments and directs the researcher to locations outside the County Record Office in Shire Hall, There are also helpful notes on Probate Records, Methodist & Quaker registers all of which will assist the family historian.

Francis Barrett has recently been researching the background to the men of Cottenham who are named on the village war memorial. Sergeant Albert Beaumont died of wounds at Warminster in December 1915, aged 39. He had served with the Colours for over 20 years, including the South African war, His was the first military funeral ever remembered at Cottenham, the gun-carriage with six horses accompanied by 25 soldiers with officers, proceeding from his home in Garibaldi Terrace along Rooks Street to the cemetery in Lambs Lane.

Also commemorated is Henry Cundell, the first serviceman to be buried with full Salvation Army honours in France in 1917 and Florence Cox, commandant of the Cottenham Red Cross Hospital between 1915 and 1918. This was established in the school room of the Old Baptist Chapel where they treated wounded soldiers conveyed by motor ambulance from Cambridge,

The Hospital moved to the rectory in October 1917 and closed in 1919. From the Second War comes the story of Able Seaman Frederick Hopkins, badly wounded when his ship was hit by a mine in 1940 he was invalided from the navy and was working as a civilian at Bourn aerodrome when he was killed there in an air raid in August 1941. The 16 page booklet is a welcome reminder of those who did not grow old.

Stephen Hawking is the subject of a biography published in America in the "Lives of the physically challenged" series by Chelsea House Publishers. Considered by many to be the most brilliant theoretical physicist since Albert Einstein, Hawking is a familiar figure in Cambridge in his motorised wheelchair whilst his best-selling "A brief history of time" expounds the theories of Black Holes which is far beyond my comprehension, This latest biography however is concerned less with the physics than the man himself and the strength and courage he has needed to cope with the crippling disease which has left him paralysed,

"An atlas of the breeding birds of Cambridgeshire", published by Cambridge Bird Club; "Genealogical sources in Cambridgeshire" by Michael Farrar, price £2,50 from County Record Office, Shire Hall, 'Cottenham, Cambridgeshire ; the war memorial" by Francis Garrett published by Cottenham village society at £2 "Stephen Hawking, revolutionary physicist" by Melissa McDaniel, published by Chelsea House, New York

We try in the Cambridgeshire Collection to keep up to date with modern developments, yet often the latest accessions echoes something filed away in past

Thus we have just received newsletters from the Friendship Link which was formed in response to the terrible hardships being suffered .by those caught up in the fighting in the former Yugoslavia. The Relief Aid Bulletin reports some of the activities to bring aid and support to refugees with appeals for old coats to be sent to Bosnia and accounts of lorry loads of aid making the journey to Croatia, Yet "The War Budget" carries a similar story - large numbers of Serbian boy refugees being cared for in Cambridgeshire and helping out by picking fruit in local orchards - though it is dated August 1916

Other youngsters were also being cared for at that time, including Belgian refugees, some of whom had fled the German advance and found shelter amongst the people of Soham, Alois Allaert and his family were greeted by a large crowd on their arrival at Soham station and cheered to Messrs Taylor Bros' covered carriage which conveyed them to their new home in High Street, with one of the family sitting outside with the driver carrying three Allied flags. Elsewhere throughout the county similar scenes were enacted

Lorry loads of aid had left Cambridge too during the Spanish Civil War when various local men had joined the International Brigade, Once more the suffering was brought home to local people through the arrival of child evacuees, black-eyed, black-haired boys and girls from the Basque Region, They were orphans of militiamen who had been killed early in the war and brought up as "children of heroes". They were greeted at Cambridge station in June 1937 by a crowd of several hundred and conveyed in a small fleet of cars to the Y.M.C.A, Hall for a large tea before being taken to their new home in the Vicarage at Pampisford which had been renovated for their reception. One problem facing the organisers was the children's schooling and the loft over the stables was pressed into use, but in June it was like an oven and in December it froze.

The story of the organisation that went into their care was recorded in a booklet entitled "Recuerdos" which was printed and sold by the Cambridge Daily News at the time. Just two years later a much larger evacuation was under way as thousands of children once more descended on Cambridgeshire. But this time they were English children, driven from their London homes by the threat of air-raids. They too had to be welcomed - though some recall standing-in a line on Parkers Piece to be picked over by reluctant-foster-parents who had to be severely cajoled into welcoming an additional child into their homes. Then there were the parents - it was one thing taking a child, but who would want another woman in her kitchen. What of the extra blankets that would be needed, how were they to be educated when schools were already full of local children. And what did the visitors think of the ways of the country without skating rinks, fish and chip shops and the other necessities of life.

Similar problems were being faced in other countries, each of whose children suffered from the effects of war. Now a journalist with the Ashai Newspaper, the biggest national paper in Japan, is visiting Cambridge on June 2nd and would like to hear at first hand from anybody who was involved in the Evacuation process, as child, organiser, foster-parent or teacher.

Might I ask anybody who feels they could spare the time to talk to Mrs Susie Konda to write to me at the Cambridgeshire Collection, Lion Yard Library. It would be wonderful if people could jot down their memories so that this side of war-time life can be more fully recorded in our files

"Why do you wander the streets with your eyes in the gutter?" "Because you told me to." Such an interchange between a Headmaster and a sprog half his age seems unremarkable even if the answer might not have been the one expected. The difference was that it was the Headmaster doing the wandering and he was well into his 90s

Sandford Woods first came to Cambridge in the 1920s as an undergraduate at St Catharine's college. He participated in the "Toot and come in" rag of 1924, mimicking the excavations of Tutankhamen's Tomb, except that this discovery was made not in Egypt but in the Market Square toilets from which a variety of curious objects was excavated. Perhaps this is evidence of an early fascination for the low life since in recent years he has been pointing his camera at the gratings covering drains and manhole covers identifying many different styles and designs, some made by local ironfounders. Sometimes such gratings are alongside one of his other passions, road and street signs, as on King's Parade where the sign for an underground restaurant seems to point straight down the drain.

Other items of street furniture have also caught his eye, feet scrapers or war-time ARP notices together with a pair of lions alongside steps on Chesterton Road, quite near the dogs drinking trough erected by Prince Chular of Siam in 1934 in memory of his pet Tony who gave him happiness and" friendship during his Cambridge years

One of Wood's other memories relates to the day he was part of the crowd who invaded Newnham college and smashed down its gates in the aftermath of the vote which once again rejected women's claims for equal rights with their male academic colleagues. That too may have influenced his decision to include ironwork in his pictorial survey. Thus railings around gardens or surrounding steps down to basement kitchens are depicted.

Straightening his back he discovers various types of pillar boxes, one with spikes on the top - perhaps to stop people jumping on top and climbing over the adjacent wall whilst others suggest they were placed to frighten away a troublesome swan that would insist on perching on top of it. In his earlier life Wood had his eyes on higher things too, becoming a schoolteacher in Dublin just after the troubles of the 1920s and moving on eventually to become Headmaster of Gotham Grammar School, Bristol. A copy of his portrait in full academic dress hangs alongside a photograph of his home town of Macclesfield with smoke pouring from numerous factory chimneys.

There are few factories here but lots of colleges with lamps and sundials to record, together with fanlights and - looking to higher things still - churches - a remarkable mixture of Christiadephian, Seventh-Day Adventist, Christian Bretheren, or Spiritualist - not to mention Mosque and Synagogue which fascinated him as he discovered and explored, often walking miles along streets and alleyways, always alert for some new sight to photograph,

Those who spotted and questioned why he should find their particular property of such interest would be rewarded with the opportunity to converse for a few minutes with a most enthusiastic and youthful ninety-year-old, Now as he moves from his De Freville address he has donated his collection to us - and if I was really instrumental on starting him on his quest then it was one of the best things I could have done.

Why do our Parish Council meetings take so long? It may be parish-pump politics but we no longer have any parish pumps to worry about. Not like at Comberton in 1894 where they made regulations after farmers and machine owners had literally pumped them dry, or at Manea when in 1902 parishioners had to be warned not to use water from the town pump except for domestic purposes, whilst Reach residents' protests that they had to carry water from the far end of the village since the wells at their end did not produce an adequate supply were met with short shift from Swaffham Prior council. When in 1928 Reach well was condemned it prompted a battle with Newmarket Rural District Council over who was to pay for a new one.

At Ashley most of the concern over water centred on the ponds with a complaint in 1895 that the water was in such a bad state that it was unfit to brew beer with! It was a disgrace to the village, being polluted with soap suds. However when they were offered the opportunity to acquire a good supply of piped water the residents soon objected - as they did in many villages, none of us minded piped water, we all objected to the cost of providing it and packed meetings went on long into the evening.

What of sanitation. Most labourers' cottages were served with dry lavatories and disposal of the contents was the responsibility of the residents. Many parish councils agreed to purchase night soil carts, but then the question arose as to where to dispose of it - whilst others reported that the cart, once used, was being washed clean in the village pond.

Parish councils often have to chivvy others. Balsham wrote to the R.D.C. in 1946 asking to be given priority when new sewage systems were being planned. They reminded them in 1949, protested in 1952, agitated in 1959 and finally got their wishes in 1961

Street lighting is another topic which can take time. Cottenham had its own gas supply when in 1925 it decided to take responsibility for lighting, buying 62 lamps for a cost of £145 from The new Cottenham Gas and Water Company. However things seem not to have been fully satisfactory for within a few years they were seeking quotes from the Beds. Cambs. and Hunts Electricity company. Histon were pursuing the same line of enquiry and were quoted £10 a standard which they considered excessive, Chivers tendered at £5 a standard but they finally accepted the Electricity Power Company's price of £12.4.0 (£12.20) including erection.

Traffic problems can also be debated at length; in 1903 Parish Councils were asked to mark on a 6" map all the dangerous roads and turnings so that could be signposted - we still urge for action on blind bends. Cottenham agitated for a light railway from their village to Shepreth, but then changed their minds and tried for one to Milton, and then to Oakington (councillors can still change their minds from meeting to meeting). Histon complained in 1903 that the rail fare to Cambridge was too high - at 4½d each way it was 50% higher than the 6d (2.5p) return bus ticket. However they objected when the line was axed under the Beeching proposals and are doubtless even now commenting about the proposed reopening.

These issues and many more are recorded in a new history produced to mark the centenary of parish councils in Cambridgeshire which has been compiled by the Secretary of the Association of Local Councils. The book will be launched shortly and part of the proceeds of each sale will go to the Association to aid its work in meeting the needs of the hundreds of councillors who every month devote time and effort to ensuring that their community is as perfect as practical. Such dedication deserves recognition and they can apply for a cut-price book as their reward!

Two neighbouring communities have recently commemorated the heroism of their fighting men, albeit that the fighters were civilians and the enemy many miles away

The cannon on the green at Ely is testimony to many battles. Was this not the cannon that Oliver Cromwell used to fire long-range shots from his manor house on Stuntney Hill, demolishing the Cathedral's north-west transept - or the cannon that accomplished the same feat by firing from the other direction along Cannon Street, or indeed the cannon that the Cathedral authorities used to defend themselves against Cromwell's men who were drilling on St Mary's Green outside the home of their Lord Protector,

Indeed it was not, for the cannon itself carries a Russian inscription and dates from the early 1800s. It had been captured following bloody fighting at Sebastopol in the Crimean war and came to Ely in 1860 to commemorate the patriotic fervour of the formation of their Rifle Volunteers. Arrangements were made for the trophy to be delivered by train to Ely station and the Ely Rifle Volunteers ordered new uniforms so they might provide a fitting escort. Sadly London tailors failed to finish the task in time and so they could not take part. Instead a contingent of Coldstream Guards were engaged - only they could not attend either and a group of Grenadiers came in their place,

Things went from bad to worse with the cannon sinking into the water-soaked grass surrounding the stone base on which it was to have stood - to the amusement of a contingent of little boys who - like their grown-up companions - were quickly ready with advice. The story is well told in a recently-reissued history by the late Reg Holmes, commemorating an event now long forgotten.

When the peace of an early June morning was shattered by an explosion many Ely folk were startled from their beds. Many Soham folk were somewhat more shaken as the glass in their windows shattered and the houses shook, Somewhere out in the darkness four railwayman had combined to save the town from complete disaster, An ammunition train laden with bombs had been approaching the station when it was hit by a V-rocket - or so the German newspapers in the Channel Islands were to claim,

Quite what did happen to cause the lead wagon to catch fire was never established but driver, fireman, guard and signalman each played their part in disconnecting the blazing truck and steaming it as far away from the rest of the load as possible before the inevitable explosion demolished the station, killed signalman and fireman and flung the driver through the air to crash down two hundred yards away, Their heroism has long been recognised.

But there were many other involved in the aftermath - the butcher-fireman who crawled down into the rubble strewn crater next to the wreck of the hissing locomotive, the men who confronted the possibility that the rest of the trucks might yet explode, the ARP and medical volunteers needing to put training into practice and the hundreds of ordinary folk whose lives would never be the same, but who still had their lives thanks to the action of the railwayman.

This story has now been told by Anthony Day, "But for such men as these" covers also the background to the event and its aftermath, with biographies of the principal players and photographs, including several taken by Walter Martin Lane of Ely who hired a taxi to take him and his camera to Soham to record his first great scoop, The second was to follow three years later during the 1947 floods,

Taking a few days break in Rutland is like travelling back into the past; peaceful countryside, tranquil villages and an unhurried atmosphere of some generations ago. In fact we scarcely noticed that the guidebook we were using was over 40 years old!

So near Cambridgeshire that perhaps something might be acquired from antique emporium or antiquarian bookshop. But just a glimpse of a token by which a Leverington farmer paid his men, a postcard of Queens' and a copy of the interesting collection of engravings "Bygone King's" - probably not overpriced at £75.00 but not worth acquiring as a duplicate. Then pottering into St Andrew's church at Whissendine we discover what became of the screen from St John's College which was no longer needed following its restoration - yet the guidebook says the church acquired it in 1892 whilst the chapel was rebuilt between 1863-69. It appears that the cousin of the then Vicar was a Fellow of St John's and the Architect was common to both jobs so the deal was done,

One wonders whether we could spot any differences should we follow an equally-old guidebook to Cambridgeshire - say the Arthur Mee book of 1939, "The factory chimneys give place to orchards and elms as we draw near this cherry village" he says of Cherry Hinton, whilst Histon has the great Chivers factory with 2000 people who turn out a hundred tons of jam every day. Stuntney Hall is sadly no longer a "gabled house in a cluster of farm buildings", Stretham centenarian windmill has lost the white sails which were visible from afar and although Milton may still have its "thatched cottages leading to a church in a lovely bower of trees" this might not be the main impression to strike the visitor in 1994.

Even in Rutland there are differences. No longer are there "decent enjoyable wines at less than 8/- (40p) a bottle", and although at Normanton the "little white church seems to float alone" it is no longer "in a large denuded park" but in a reservoir. For in the 1970s over 3,000 acres of Rutland was turned into Rutland Water, a vast lake that seems almost natural to the blinker tourist with their eyes fixed on the detail of the guidebook but which to many residents must have marked the dramatic spoliation of their landscape. There is of course nothing to be done about it, the man-made lake is now permanent, the fields gone for good

Yet in Cambridgeshire in 1947 thousands of acres also disappeared under water and an impression of the disaster has come into the Collection recently courtesy of the children of class 3/4 K of Littleport v.c.p. school. They never saw the floods themselves - and with good luck they might never do so. All they saw were some slides taken by W. Martin Lane and heard me chattering on about them. So what impression did they gain - "I saw a house got bashed down" ,, "I saw trees, I saw Ely Cathedral in the pictures" - and they drew wrecked bungalows, with saucepans in the garden, "the house what is broke down in the fen", people rowing back to their devastated properties, Nicola recalled "some man decided to drain Littleport and the river bank burst and they used tetnks",

But one thing puzzles me: Danielle remembers the pictures - "and then he clicked it and another picture came up", But then "in the middle he was drinking coffee, So he stopped while he drank his coffee" - I don't remember this at all – but that was before we left with the 40-year-old guidebook to seek wine at 8/- a bottle!

I have recently had the privilege of seeing Cambridgeshire through Japanese eyes. Escorting a journalist and her translator intent on discovering something of the impact of war-time evacuation on children and foster-parents alike I discovered instead how hospitable local folk are, how helpful landladies and publicans, how pleasant to buy shrubs from a garden centre and then watch the antics of the proprietor trying to wrap them in brown paper without any sellotape and finally resorting to asparagus string. The English climate is changeable but rain always stops just before it is time to go outdoors and cyclists in the narrowness of Trinity street - is this really the main street of Cambridge - always anticipate every move and never collide with visitors

It is of course a picture only partially true, just as London evacuees were always scruffy, Cambridgeshire cottages warm and welcoming and everybody smiled through despite blackout, rationing, bombing and lack of basic sanitation. But in their careful questioning of those who remembered the 1940s many first-hand facts and impressions were elucidated and many notes made on the reporters pad, carefully, neatly and totally illegible to Western eyes.

Similar cryptic observations were being made in Cambridge in the 1840s by someone who knew Trinity Street well and his old College hosted a launch for the latest volume of Joseph Romilly's diary, covering the period 1842-1847, Romilly was a senior academic, one of those who masterminded the election of Prince Albert as Chancellor in 1847 and then was present at the reception which degenerated into confusion and crowding as the procession moved off - an event when occupies several pages of diary and book alike.

Romilly was also an acute observer of the detail of contemporary life. Thus from his entries for 1844 we follow his sister Lucy on her visits to the poorer side of Hills Road, visiting Mrs Penson in Newtown, where - a footnote informs us -sanitation did not exist and "conditions were so wretched as to be a disgrace to civilisation". Transportation was erratic; on 4th March the Wisbech stagecoach was cancelled so he had to walk home from Audley End on a miserable wet day (and to make things worse that night he lost his money at Whist). On a journey to Ely on 24th May he noted the devastation in Stretham following the fire of three weeks earlier, 25 houses and barns destroyed by accident - though the diary also records incidents of incendiarism elsewhere.

Sometimes his luck turns as on 13th July when he is reminded by the College Porter that he was due to dine with the Judges at Trinity that evening - having already eaten at home at 3pm. He just had time to change and tuck in to a meal of Turtle and venison and was then offered coffee by the Master, This, Romilly notes, saved him 2/- (10p) - the usual tip to the Judge's servants - for they were not at the door when he left. Meanwhile the Judges themselves were waiting for the rain to abate before driving off in their carriage.

The diarist witnesses the opening of the Railway Station which was adorned with flags - as one might expect, but so was the new Hills Road railway bridge - and records the controversy over a prize-fight at Newmarket which the Proctors did everything to deter students from attending, even threatening to suspend the licence of any stable who let a horse to carry an undergraduate in that direction. The diaries are detailed and contain many tantalising allusions to contemporary events which the editors have expanded and explained with detailed indexes, It is a delightful addition to the literature of Cambridgeshire, Wildfowl were once an important part of Cambridgeshire's rural economy. One acknowledged expert was "Old Merry", a full-time wildfowler who in 1772 was reported to have shot a large eagle at Stretham ferry.

An extraordinary marksman he favoured a gun with a barrel over six feet in length which was so heavy that only the most powerful arm could extend and elevate, yet with this he could kill a snipe on the wing. Like other shooters he would glide across flooded areas of fenland on his punt, the monster gun pointing out at the front ready to down dozens of duck at one shot. Yet Merry had another string to his bow and supplemented his income by guiding parties in search of sport.

Today the fens are drained yet some areas of the county still attract shooters. One is an old gravel pit at Hauxton where parties of friends gather from time to time to shoot pheasants and pigeons, rabbit and duck, some of which have increased greatly in number due to careful game management and others despite it. Elsewhere anglers pay for the privilege of fishing well-stocked lakes. The habitat they enjoy may appear natural but is the result of heavy machinery & many hours of hard work by Will Garfit who has recently published an account of his endeavours which in 1988 won him a prestigious prize for game and wildlife management.

The gravel pits had been dug for nearly thirty years by Wisbey Brothers, being excavated as and when there was demand. By 1970 they had come to the end of their commercial viability and were put up for sale together with various other parcels of land, Garfit had known the area since childhood and attended the auction out of curiosity. When the bidding ground to a halt at just £7,500 for the 69 acres he was prompted to raise his own hand. A few moments later the 25 year-old art student was facing the prospect of firstly raising the money he had just spent, and secondly how to explain it all to his wife! Somehow he survived and has prospered as is told in "Will's shoot"

If a student can establish a game shoot then schoolchildren can found a nature reserve. When the RSPB paid £8,000 in 1977 for 66 acres of disused cressbeds it was money raised by sponsored bird watching by members of the Young Ornithologists Club. Now an area bought by children has become a very special place for young people. George Hallworth established the watercress beds just outside Fowlmere in the early 1900s and at one time some seventeen men were employed with women being taken on at busy times to bunch up the cress being paid about 6d (2.5p) for 144 bunches.

The history of the site has been traced back to the Ice Age, Romans camped there and criminals were beheaded and left to rot. In the nineteenth-century the Foul Mire attracted visitors who came to shoot wildfowl and were assisted by villagers one of whom would hire out his punt to University students for 10/-(50p) the afternoon. Then, if the outing was unsuccessful (and somehow he always contrived to make sure that it was) he would sell them two or three duck that he happened just to have by him, so they could go back to their college with their sporting prowess assured. Others found another source of food there - edible frogs which had a loud croak and were known locally as Fowlmere nightingales.

Now it is a much more peaceful area, except when school parties descend by the coachload to tour the reserve, spot kingfishers, pond dip, visit the hide, eat their sandwiches and enjoy learning part of their National Curriculum under the supervision of experienced naturalists. The story has been told in a new book by Les Price which reveals a fascinating yet largely unknown area available to all

Public Libraries were originally set up in opposition to Public Houses -providing a place where the working man could spend his evenings in study rather than in drinking. It is surprising therefore to find the Cambridgeshire Collection featured in the latest pub guide, though it is our "treasure house of books, magazines, newspapers and photographs" which have attracted the reviewer rather than any cellar of dusty barrels.

Amongst some of the books are earlier attempts at surveying local drinking places and it is interesting to compare some of the entries in "Pints worth finding" with those in the little guide produced by the Cambridgeshire Public House Trust Association in 1909. There are of course differences, CAMRA exists to encourage traditional beers and traditional pubs whereas the Public House Trust was more concerned with the supply of non-alcoholic beverages and food, encouraging its Managers to serve tea, coffee and cocoa wherever possible.

In some cases there have been few changes - the George and Dragon at Snailwell provided stabling and cycling accommodation in 1909 and had a tea room - but not now, according to CAMRA, any real ale, so they give it short shift. The George at Babraham - where teas were a special feature - receives similar treatment, though the Three Tuns at Gt Abington, where in 1909 luncheons and teas were quickly served, is reported as retaining its old fashioned lounge bar but not apparently a welcome for the CAMRA surveyors.

Other landlords must have welcomed the compilers of the 1907 returns of Licenced Houses with even less grace since their reports pried into the number of rooms available for lodgers, what stabling was available and the state of the sanitary conveniences - "filthy and dilapidated" at the Hare and Hounds, Haddenham, though in fine condition at the Globe in the same village where Mary Nightingale had been landlord for 48 years.

In those days most every village had dozens of pubs, now there are only one or two. For the traveller seeking a half-pint of beer or a plate of chips distinguishing between them can prove a problem and this is why the new guide is an essential addition to the clutter in the glove pocket of our car, though no guide can ever explain quite why a "Ploughman's" varies so greatly from pub to pub. The more active - such as devotees of bar billiards, crib, shove ha'penny, dominoes, darts or boule (all offered by the Carpenter's Arms at Gt Wilbraham) - can also track down their ideal combination of sport and brew

For those who prefer spirits there is a section on haunted pubs - watch out for the little grey man at the Rose and Crown in Histon whose visits coincide with doors opening themselves and objects moving or even disappearing for a while. There are unexplained footsteps at the Carpenters Arms, Gt Wilbraham which scares the pub cats, a friendly ghost at the Anchor Little Downham perhaps connected with Jack the Ripper but more likely as one of the pub's rooms used to act as the village mortuary. A more troublesome spirit causes problems in Willingham where glasses fall off the shelves in unusual directions, sideways or even upwards, while even china dogs have been seen to travel horizontally from the shelf in the King William IV at Burwell.

The stories do of course have to be taken with a pinch of salt, or a pint of Boddingtons, Old Speckled Hen, Merrie Monk or SOD (Shefford Old Dark brewed in Bedfordshire) any of which can be located through careful perusal in "Pints worth finding"

It was inevitably going to happen. On the same day that the proofs of my new book "Images of Cambridge" arrive from the publisher we receive another batch of photographs taken by H.S. Johnson

There are at least six that would have fitted in very well, One that would have been absolutely essential is a view of Peas Hill looking towards Bene't Street and showing the line of shops which were demolished in the middle 1930s for the Arts Theatre, But as well as showing the now forgotten architecture it also has two of the other characteristics I have been looking for, One is the pair of girls strolling across the street - in "Images" I have tried to get pictures which show people in their setting and period and my favourite is a group of children picking flowers outside Sedley School in Malta Road in about 1933. But Johnson also showed something of the traffic of the time - in this case very few cars, but then Shrive's and Fletcher's shops are shut so perhaps it is a Sunday (or Thursday afternoon when shops used to have half-day closing)

I had already selected one of his views of Sidney Street and Petty Cury but think the new one is even better, As well as showing the new Boots development nestling behind the shops on the corner of the Cury it also depicts the telephone box with its ornate top and a policeman on point duty as one of Millers' vans approaches. I do have something of both of course with the Millers supplying instruments which undergraduates are playing on a 1928 rag float (one of Dale's Brewery lorries, and if you're in to beer just wait till you see the barrels being loaded from the Albion Brewery in 1963 - making a good contrast to a picture of the Stable Bar at the Turk's Head). As for the police well they're represented on both happy and tragic occasions involving students ~ a 1950s rag scene and the horrendous headlines after an undergraduate shot his tutor and Detective Willis at King's College in June 1930, How ironic this should have occurred in the same year that the Gallows at the County Gaol were sold off and hundreds of law-abiding folk.: took: the opportunity to tour the old prison before it was demolished

Nevertheless it is now too late to change the selection, Nor can I substitute a newly-borrowed view of the Cattle Market in the 1950s for the one already processed, This is a pity since the new one shows the bustle of the market and is better than anything I discovered when going through the thousands of photographs filed at the Cambridge Evening News, There were however some wonderful discoveries, including a view of students queuing for their May-Ball breakfast outside Waffles in Fitzroy Street June 1974 in the days when the Kite was either a magical oasis of individuality at a time of conformity or a run-down and decaying backwater, depending on your viewpoint,

The 1950s were probably the most difficult decade to depict, once into the 1960's - the era of the Beatles and parking meters & the 70's when Jerry Bol was arrested for busking there are no shortage of pictures, As for the penultimate chapter on the 1980's and 1990's - Green Bikes, rebuilding Magdalene Bridge and the visit of Princess Di to Cherry Hinton - they are all chosen.

The problem is the last bit, If we are really telling the story of Cambridge in the 20th century, and using over 200 pages and 350 pictures to do it, then we must also look forward to the end of the Millennium, What changes will we see in the next six years - more building, a new football stadium, underground car parks? It would be nice to wait a bit longer but the book is due out in September and is already being advertised so that people who wish to subscribe may have their name - or that of a friend of business - printed in the back, of course you may already be in it

It is that time of year again where just as one group of University students go down another group come up. Colleges which have recently rung with concerns over examinations, the preparations for the May Ball or the progress of the Rowing Eight now echo with even more strange accents as students from around the globe come to Cambridge as part of the International Summer School programmes organised by the University Board of Continuing Education.

They will attend classes on subjects such as the English legal system, British politics or The Celts in Antiquity and choose from a range of lectures such as "Cambridge and the computer", "Espionage in Cambridge" or even "Dickensian Cambridge", most given by scholars of some repute, though I make no such claims for the latter. They will write essays, enjoy meals in College dining halls taking their turn on Top Table when their student colleagues stand for them as the Top Table party process to their seats and the Latin Grace is said. They will have a tremendous time and - according to at least one American judge - spend the rest of the year endeavouring to introduce into every conversation something of what they did when they studied at Cambridge University.

One can never know just what foreign visitors think of us, although perhaps Malin Wedin was not completely enamoured for he committed some thoughts in a poem entitled "Cursed be all Englishmen" ... "May your kettles always boil over ,, May your royalty always be adulterous ... and may atmospherics always occur during Coronation Street and Eastenders. But he leaves his worst till last ... "may Mrs Thatcher continue her reign of terror to rule your country forever" His words are included in "Waiting Loudly" an anthology of writing produced by students at the EF International School and published in aid of the Save the Children Fund.

Meanwhile some local people leave Cambridge to take something of the British way of life to other parts of the world. One such was Marianne Goadby, daughter of a Baptist minister in Isleham who spent her early life travelling round the country distributing religious tracts, visiting the sick and dying and engaging in "acts of piety and mercy proper for an active and devoted female" (this was the 1820s!) She married a Baptist minister in May 1833 and two months later left England for foreign shores. The journey to Calcutta took four months and within the year she was dead. Her work in promoting "the glory of God and the eternal welfare of the deluded heathen" was of short duration, but her memory has been kept alive in a new book tracing the Cambridgeshire connections with the Baptist Missionary Society between 1792 and 1992, portraying something of the excitement, challenge, dangers and sacrifice of local men and women.

Several of the missionaries have connections with Histon whose Parish Council minute books have provided the source for a new village history between 1894 and 1984. All village life is there – no tents on the village green except at Feast time (1895) - though it was necessary to remind traction engine drivers again in 1903. Residents in Pages Close were reprimanded for putting soap suds in the ditch in front of their homes (1915), Impington school conditions were contributing to the measles epidemic of 1932 and the council certainly did not want a small pox hospital proposed by the County council in 1938, though they did accept next year that in the event of air raids up to 200 people could be found accommodation in the village school. Parish councils generate considerable amounts of correspondence, much of it to the County Council, and in the days before the Citizens Charter it could take some time to deal with - in 1977 the County Surveyor was reporting that suggestions or complaints about road repairs might take 30 months to answer!

I'm eagerly waiting the next issue of "Mercia Bioscope", the journal of the Mercia cinema society. There are so many publications of this type catering for special interest groups, that it is impossible to keep track of all of them - or to be truthful of hardly any - so I am grateful to the editor for bringing to my attention a series of four articles by Martin Tapsell on the cinemas of rural Cambridgeshire. The November 1993 covered villages from Burwell where the Parish Council's Gardiner Memorial Hall was licensed for film shows from May 1919, though cinema-goers packed into the gallery as well as the body of the hall, which was actually in breach of the conditions, Cottenham had some films in Lordship Hall apparently - though there is no other detail whilst the church hall in Haddenham could pack in some 300 people when used between 1921 and 1930. The series continues in the February 1994 issue covering the Shepherd's Hall, Linton and the enemas at Littleport, though he omits to record how one of them was hit by incendiary bombs during the second world war just after it had finished showing the film entitled "On the night of the fire"! A travelling cinema even reached Manea whilst Sawston of course had its own proper cinema - though not without a fuss. Henry Spicer, owner of Sawston paper mills was persuaded to provide money and land for the new Village College on the understanding that he could show films in the college hall.

However once it was opened the County Council reneged on the deal so Henry built "Spicer's Cinema" adjacent to the college and showed films from 1932 to 1963. Hopefully the next issue will cover Stretham where I remember as a lad attending picture shows in the village school, principally memorable not for the films but for the singing of the favourite signature tune of the time "Over the mountains over the seas"

Royston too had cinema as is recalled in Frederic Sillence's "Twentieth century Royston, volume 1". The first building opened in Priory Lane on July 1st 1913. Charges varied between 4d and 1/- (2p-5p) with those in the cheaper seats enduring straight forms with wooden backs. The excitement on the screen could not match the excitement in the hall when the policeman's son was attacked and stabbed during a film show. Following the development of various topics involves scanning chapter after chapter of the book which covers the period from 1900 to the middle 1950s and is well illustrated with photographs including one of two Ortona bus-loads of football supporters en route to watch Royston football club lose a cup final at Histon, thus interesting both bus and soccer supporters,

Another subject to attract enthusiasts is windmills and those around Wisbech are the subject of a newly-published history based on the work of Arthur Oldham about 50 years ago. His original notes exist only in typescript form but have been updated and added to together with personal reminiscences. From the eight sail mill on Lynn Road Wisbech to Muckle Mill, White Engine Mill and Luton Gowts near Long Sutton, Lincolnshire, the booklet is full of interest. White Engine Mill was a wooden drainage mill which caught fire on 19th March 1826 causing the Drainage Commissioners to discuss a replacement. They rebuilt it at a cost of £1,634.19.7, having received £1,000 in insurance payment but within 9 years it was obsolete owing to improved drainage technology. The mill sold for £300 and was converted into a corn mill, a function it served until March 1895 when all the sails were blown off in a gale. Even this was not the end for the mill was repaired and continued to operate into the 1920s. Oldham's notes have been supplemented by Robert Bell of the excellent Wisbech and Fenland Museum who hopes to make this just the first of a series of booklets giving in-depth studies of individual mills

The other morning I had a journey to work which started as entertaining and ended up as frightening - and it was all due to the blond in the blue car.

As the rush-hour traffic began to bunch on the A10 I wondered why the car in front was veering first to one side then to the other - to the edge of the verge, to the centre of the road and back again. Then I noticed the movement of the car coincided with the movement of the driver's arm - comb hair one side, move that way, comb hair the other side move back again. For some three miles she combed her hair, glancing in the mirror from time to time to check the result. Then, hair done for the moment she started on the makeup, the driver's mirror tilted a little further as first one layer than another was applied.

By this time I felt it safer to be in front rather than behind - and ensured another vehicle was between us too. Sadly he turned off into Milton village - and now the makeup had reached even more crucial stage. By the time we were driving down Milton Road - in the hurly-burly of rush-hour - she had reached the mascara and eye-lash stage, and now the mirror was well and truly turned and her attention truly fixed on it. At every hold-up I left space behind the vehicle in front in case her inbuilt, sense of radar failed to detect what her eyes were not looking at, When she finally veered off the journey suddenly became more tranquil - despite the battalions of bicycling foreign students!

It would not have happened years ago, when cars did not drive themselves to the extent they do today. Drivers of the Bassingbourn-built "Rational" motors in 1904 were exposed to the elements - the hair-do would have taken all day! They were high-backed four seater cars with solid tyres and carbide lamps. With their aluminium and copper tube radiators they were the latest thing on the road, capable of a top speed of 25 mph and powerful enough to climb Arrington Hill. They had two forward gears which made them ideal for use as London taxis and for a while the Heatly & Gresham foundry and engineering works in High Street ensured that Bassingbourn was one of the country's leading motor centres. Then in 1905 the company transferred its works nearer to London and no more vehicles were manufactured. Their activities are summarised in "A chronicle of two villages" charting change in Kneesworth and its sister village between 1894 and the present day,

If the Rational taxis are remembered what of Percival's Motors of King Street Cambridge who could supply saloon and touring cars to drive yourself or with chauffeur and had motor coaches for hire; meanwhile L.A. Rich of Fitzroy Lane supplied second-hand car spares from any of the hundreds of cars they dismantled whilst Bryant and Howlett, coach and motor body builders could construct new vehicles of every description - sadly their story seems not yet to have been told. Frank Legge of Victoria Street garage offered smart up-to-date private saloons at reasonable rates for tours or day trips, Q. Love, furniture removal contractors (& piano removal experts) had two modern motor removal vans which feature amongst the advertisements on a newly-received "Multiple mileage chart of Cambridge and district" issued with the compliments of Somerlite - importers of Pentella petrol, vaporising oils and greases - about 1935.

These were the days when the Milton road "merry-go-round" - Mitcham's roundabout was opened (1932) to be followed next year by another at Four Lamps, when parking controls were being urged "sometimes cars and bikes are parked so closely in line in Petty Cury that pedestrians cannot find space between them" (1934) and when the speed limit was abolished, only to be brought back in 1935 after four years due to the number of accidents,

Oh yes, in 1904 a blindfolded motorist drove through Cambridge in the rush hour – but in those days it was newsworthy!

Returning to work from just one week away I discover that no fewer than twenty-five new books or booklets relating to Cambridgeshire have accumulated in my "In" box. It used to be a tray once upon a time which I could keep clear, now its a succession of boxes which I do try very hard to redistribute to one pile or another - inevitably I fail,

It is not the weather for working, its not even the weather for wandering in college gardens but for those who enjoy such delights even in a heatwave a new guide by Richard Bird is essential. One of the amazing things about Cambridge is that you can nip through a narrow doorway on a busy street and instantly find yourself in quiet solitude in a garden that would do credit to any country house - indeed the 17 acres of Newnham College would probably outdo most of them with its sunken rose garden, herbaceous borders and the curious mound that was once the College observatory. All this in a college which was only founded in 1871 and some have been around for 300 years longer. Yet the tradition of gardening continues today at the new Robinson College making use of the winding stream of the Bin Brook that runs through its grounds.

Newnham College also features in Geoff Yeates' contribution to literature this one concentrating not on gardens but ghosts. Its founder, Henry Sidgwick was also founder of the Society for Psychical Research and had an interest in spiritualism. His work was assisted by his wife who also combined the post of assistant to Lord Rayleigh in his scientific research at the Cavendish Laboratory with that of Vice Principal, and later Principal at Newnham. She was responsible for sifting through the reports and claims of ghostly happenings and rejecting many of them.

One such concerns an apparition at Emmanuel College - a figure in bridal veil who appeared to various occupants of a particular room. But Mrs Sidgwick could find insufficient evidence, with one witness described as excitable, imaginative and nervous. Nevertheless it appears in the new book. There is also the tale of the Everlasting Club at Jesus - which makes a good story, especially to an after-dinner group in one of the rooms there - although once more any evidence seems to have been mislaid. Witnesses are quoted for an appearance of an ear-less head in rooms at Sidney Sussex which was accompanied by a strange smell resembling rotten raw meat, Spam and Oxo. Mind you this was noticed by an undergraduate at 1 o'clock in the morning on Halloween in 1967 and attempts to conjure up the spirit next night by conducting a séance were ruined by an invasion of members of the Psychical Research Society.

On the other hand the Master of Corpus Christi college did hang himself in the Lodge, though speculation has it that the ghost which is said to haunt the area belongs to a later era. Another Master had a daughter and she took a lover; when disturbed in the midst of a clandestine meeting she is said to have hidden him in a cupboard, only to find him dead of suffocation when she reopened it.

Open any door in Cambridge and you can find an expert behind it. Yet look up Garden or Ghost in a new Guide to Expertise and you will find nothing. But try plants and you can take your pick of crop biodiversity, organic synthesis of plant metabolites, plant physiology, ultrastructure and microscopy or really odd things about plants. Part of the problem of Cambridge is that it is so complex and finding an easy explanation of it all is a problem.

This has now been overcome by a series of booklets produced by the University's press and information office which explain simply about its history and give all those facts and figures - it costs over £220 million a year to run, employs about 7,000 members of staff (with more in the 31 individual colleges). There are about 14,500 students of whom 10% come from overseas, studying anything from Akkadian to medieval Welsh - and apparently the odd one or two see things not on the formal curriculum

'Sluice' Parker, 'Lightning' and 'Qakey' were three of the characters of Cambridge collectively known as the Three Graces. Sluice's nickname derived from his lisp which recalled the sound of water rushing through a sluice gate. He wandered around the town selling flowers from a little basket slung over his arm and was as cunning as a fox. One of his tricks was to remove a pot plant from a front garden, take it to the back door and sell it to the lady of the house as an exact match for the one she had! 'Lighting' - real name Siggers - was a newspaper seller who sported an old Etonian tie, the gift of one of the undergraduates with who he was always popular and quite ready to engage in banter, whilst 'Oakey' specialised in conducting Americans around the colleges and was well versed in pointing out sights unknown to the modern generation of Blue Badge Guides - such as the spot in Trinity College where, he claimed, Queen Elizabeth I was beheaded.

They are just three of the people encountered in the pages of a new volume of memoirs from Raymond Lister and featured alongside recollections of the High School for Boys at the time that "Tishy" Mayne was its Head in the 1930s, of the family firm of George Lister & sons, Geoffrey Keynes, the Ballet Jooss which was based in Cambridge during the Second War and Philip Gosse who bought their home at West Wratting which featured no electricity but relied on oil lamps and candles for illumination when they moved there in 1947. Once more there were characters - Billy Rash (who married a Miss Itch) and Joe Roope who, when modern flush lavatories were installed, bought the old bucket from the privy to clean up and sell in the village - hopefully not for carrying water from the village pump.

Village life was not all pleasant in the past as Margaret Greenwood records in "Chronicles of Bourn" which illustrates the extremes of wealth and poverty that existed in the nineteenth century. It charts the village's struggles to erect a new bridge over Bourn brook following the drowning of William Clark, grocer and draper in November 1852, after his horse had blundered off the road and into the river during flooding, and also tells the tale of the suicide in 1873 of the Earl De la Warr who drowned himself at Sheeps Green bathing place having paid the full funeral expenses of a young lady, one-time barmaid but latterly living in a house for which the Earl paid the rent. Then it was a tragedy which "cast a shadow of deepest gloom over the whole community" but one wonders how modern papers would have viewed the affair

More village activities are recorded in a booklet of extracts from Stapleford parish council minutes which start in 1894 and come right up to date with Councillors once more opposing any plans which could make the village a mere suburb of Cambridge - as they did before in 1913 and 1931. This enterprising history is well illustrated with photographs both old and new but cannot however compare in production with what must be the most attractive village booklet yet issued. Grantchester parochial church council has tapped local talent to produce most excellent colour photographs to accompany Christine Jennings' text covering the expected topics of church, Old Vicarage and Rupert Brooke as well as the less well-known areas. The whole has been put together by Pitkin Pictorials to make the sort of souvenir guide that will appeal to anybody who knows or visits the village. In order to maximise the income for the church it is only sold in the Grantchester shops and at Cambridge Tourist information centre but is well worth seeking out,

The library world is still in a state of shock following the tragedy at Norwich. The fire which started apparently quite accidentally raged through their Central Library and left the once-proud symbol of Norfolk's principal public service a smoking shell. It would appear that amongst the heaps of ashes must be included some 95% of the county's equivalent of our Cambridgeshire Collection. Norwich's local collection was amongst the finest in the country; its existence and the enthusiasm with which it was amassed and used proved the inspiration for generations of librarians as well as countless researchers. Now all the work, all the collecting and all the care that was lavished on its creation has gone up in smoke.

It leads me to reflect just what to save from amongst our own stock, given that just a minute proportion could be preserved from destruction - which books would be slid down the sloping glass roof into the Heidelberg garden. Cambridge is full of books and bookshops and most of what we hold is available in the University Library or could be replaced through the assistance of the book trade. So the expensive Ackermann's and Le Keux and the rest could be left to burn. The mass of recently-produced histories and memoirs are also likely to be have been picked up by the great copyright libraries as lists are published in "East Anglian Bibliography", "Conduit" and elsewhere - and a few reviewed in the Cambridge Weekly News! It is the pamphlets such as "The waterman of the River Cam" by Womba Smythe, a religious tract which tells how a drunken bargee was converted to Christianity by reading a leaflet sold him by a one-legged sailor which may not have survived elsewhere (although we did cause it to be reprinted some 20-odd years ago in an edition which is probably now scarcer than the original).

The newspaper files - some 500 volumes dating back to the 1770s including some 35 different titles - could be left to perish. For the most part they are also held in the British Library in London and have largely been microfilmed pending the day when the newsprint crumbles away. Our cuttings files which date back for some 30 years and cover 750 local topics are duplicated in part by the private files and indexes in the Cambridge Evening News' office library. The maps collection dating back to 1574 and including virtually every printed map issued over the last 400 years, together with files of larger Ordnance Survey sheets from 1886, are also in the Cambridge University Library map room, as are most of the engravings of local scenes issued during the nineteenth-century.

Many of our 400,000 pictures have been published in books or newspapers - including more than 6 years of weekly columns like this - and most of any significance have been copied for readers' projects. So our negative files would be a priority and whilst it is impractical to throw original glass negatives out the window most of them have now been copied as transparencies which would survive the drop. Handbills would also be a priority - the circus posters, advertisements for balloon ascents and the like together with our tape recordings which although undeveloped still remain the major oral history record in the county

No collection can be replaced unless you know what is lost but our main catalogues and indexes have been published on microfilm & the supplements on computer disk deposited elsewhere. Given time, money and the support and encouragement of the people of Cambridgeshire most of it could be replaced, but not by me. It has taken 150 years to get to what we have now, somebody else could have the challenge of rebuilding it

But where would the 1,200 readers who use the Collection every month turn for their information in the meantime? They could never find such a combination of material together in one place.

The loss would be devastating and unimaginable. Sadly our colleagues in Norfolk are having to face it for real

In preparation for my talk on Dickensian Cambridge recently I have been reading "Sketches by Boz" in which Charles Dickens describes various institutions and aspects of Victorian life. Thus gin shops, pawnbrokers shop, the criminal courts and ever Newgate prison feature. This attracted Dickens' especial interest as he toured the building describing the passages, the condemned cells and the chapel with the pew in which those due to hang were placed on the Sunday preceding their execution, their coffin by their side. The more fortunate spent their days in wards whose walls were lined with rows of large hooks on which hung the mats on which they slept and dined off a kind of stewed beef and brown bread. Although the women had some employment the men and boys had nothing to do but saunter moodily about, lounge in the window or lean against the wall. Reformers tried to segregate the hardened criminals from the first offenders and improve conditions but the gaol built to house 500 prisoners regularly contained 800.

Cambridge had a relatively new prison, opening in 1790 just behind the old Spinning House and quite separate from the County Gaol on Castle Hill. But by 1819 criticisms were being voiced over its cleanliness, lack of wholesome air and the poor state of repair - one building containing two cells fell down. By 1823 there was great agitation for a replacement and after much debate an Act of Parliament was obtained and a new gaol opened across Parker's Piece in 1828.

Men, women and children were confined together be they debtors, awaiting trial, already sentenced to up to two years imprisonment or hardened criminals awaiting transportation or transfer to prisons elsewhere. They were put on various tasks, some grinding corn on a treadmill, others picking loose fibres from old hemp ropes, constructing new cells or working in the kitchen - although in 1850 one prisoner went on strike since he was not paid for cooking Food was a source of complaint but the rule by 1865 was for "Hard Labour, Hard Fare and Hard Bed". Those who transgressed were flogged or placed in solitary confinement on bread and water for three days

In Cambridge the prison closed in 1878, 110 years later a new prison was announced for March and the first report on its conditions has recently been issued by the Home Office. Its findings in some ways repeat the problems of the Victorian gaols. At Whitemoor there are vulnerable prisoners and hardened old lags transferred from other prisons, with other Governors taking the opportunity to offload their most difficult inmates on the fledgling prison. Although they try to keep the two groups separate this proves difficult and whenever one wing takes its turn in the kitchen the other groups feels its food is under threat of contamination. Some complained of mouldy fish fingers and all recognised that the grub was inconsistent in quality and poorly presented. Just as in Victorian times some prisoners refuse to work: in the kitchen - but in this case it was up to half of the hardened criminals who know the ropes all too well and with no flogging as a deterrent there seems little that can be done

Conditions however are far superior to that endured in Cambridge where in 1823 nine men were kept in cells containing just three beds, though the Inspectors did find some of the March cells overcrowded as some inmates had pinched the soft chairs from the television room for their private use

Bear-baiting and banking make an unlikely combination of subjects to find together on our new books shelves, and indeed one would hardly expect to find an account of the former in a scholarly book devoted to Cambridge theatres between 1464 and 1720.

Alan Nelson's volume seeks to recreate details of as many theatres as possible with over 20 pages to a description of the stage at Queens' college in 1640. Another was erected inside King's college chapel for the visit of Queen Elizabeth I nearly 100 years earlier but there is some doubt about reports that she may have watched performances by Christopher Marlowe in the yard of the Falcon Inn, Petty Cury, one of the places where plays were performed within the town. The Guildhall was another although the University claimed the right to ban such performances within five miles of the town centre.

Bear—baiting was another prohibited activity, though on a Sunday morning in 1581 large crowds including Thomas Parris, the high constable gathered at Chesterton to witness a bear chained to a post which was set upon by dogs. Into the raucous noise stormed the Senior Proctor and an accompaniment of officials who promptly arrested the bear and its owner to the anger of the crowd who surged forward trapping one of the officials beside the bear - and thus in mortal danger. However reason prevailed and the crowd moved back in time though days later Thomas Parris and others were imprisoned in a Westminster jail.

The annals of banking also contain dramatic incidents worthy of record. One such must be the story of John Frederick Mortlock who staged an increasing bizarre series of attacks on his uncle who he felt had robbed him of his inheritance - even setting up a tent outside the bank in Peas Hill where, clad in a magnificent velvet lined coat, he invited donations to aid his cause - and from which he could keep up a barrage of abuse whenever the banker appeared. Sadly there is no space for such detail in Harold Preston's new book but it remains a first attempt to list some 112 early-East Anglian banks and is amply illustrated by some of the banknotes that each issued.

In the 1700s almost anybody could set up as a banker provided he could gain the trust of local people and demonstrate that he possessed the necessary hard cash to be able to honour the paper money that carried his name. From time to time there were problems as in 1825 when panic swept the banking world and investors rushed to convert the paper to sovereigns. Both partners in the Cambridge bank of Barker and Eaden journeyed to London on 12th December for cash - but were unsuccessful. Three days later the anticipated rush began and Barker had to try again, coming back with £5,000 which kept them going for two days, although they took the precaution of calling in constables to keep the rabble who packed the streets from rushing the bank. Once more they needed to journey for cash but by then the main rush had slackened and by 28th December things were back to normal. It was temporary reprieve for the bank failed in 1840. A similar run on Peckover's bank Wisbech was forestalled after they visited wealthy friends and were able to display a large number of farm sacks brimming over with gold coins under a banner which read "and a Peck-over" - just part of the story of the Quaker banking family told in Madeline Reynold's new pamphlet.

Croydon is one of those small south Cambridgeshire parishes that one needs a good map to locate. Situated next to Arrington between Wendy and Hatley St George (more mapwork!) it is just off the B road which leads to Potton. So small is the settlement - just 80 houses and a population of 194 at the last census and perhaps best known as the site of the lost village of Clopton - it was described in 1960 as being only a dormitory whose school, average attendance just ten children, was due to close though it did contrive to support a village store owned by the Law Brothers, a post office managed by Mr S. Lee and a public house, the Queen Adelaide.

The villagers could worship at either or both of the Congregational church erected in 1889 & capable of seating about half of its then 210 residents and a thirteenth-century church seating 300 whose tower was then crumbling and cracking with schemes afoot either to fortify the foundations or have it pulled down altogether.

Yet this secluded spot has come under the spotlight recently through the donation to the Collection of a series of excellent negatives depicting the village and its inhabitants at the beginning of the century. Quite who the people are taking tea in their garden, relaxing with a glass of beer from the exertion of rethatching or posing outside the white-washed and thatched "Axe and Compasses" is something that we need help to establish.

Two of the most interesting pictures reflect something of religious life with views of a mission tent, ministers outside complete with bibles and a mission van. Was this perhaps one of those operated by the Church Army who by 1902 operated four such vehicles in the Ely diocese one of which under Missioner Capt Berry visited Wendy and neighbouring villages or was the message that "The wages of sin is death" being promulgated by some other denomination.

Certainly Croydon had its share of nonconformists in the 1840s for the then Rector, Francis Fulford, compiled a list of inhabitants recording their ages, occupations, church attendance and off-the-cuff comments. This was transcribed by pupils at Bassingbourn village college and published in 1980 as "the Rector and his flock" (now out-of-print). Each house was visited and commented on and all human life is there - "I was obliged to turn Isaac out of the Sunday school, he was so unruly and turbulent", "Emma had a child by a Wendy man, expected to marry him but he deceived her" although the Rector found her a good servant and took her to London with him when he left the Village.

The Law family were "much inclined to dissent and neither of them attend often at Croydon church ... prevented partly by distance and bad roads", their children were baptised at the Bassingbourn meeting, all but the youngest, an infant born September 1842, and perhaps the Rector held out some hope of a convert there. Even regular church goers could not hide from the Rector's comments, Joseph played the clarinet at church and was a very civil man "but, I fear, drinks still, They are always in want, though they earn very high wages amongst them. She (the wife) is a woman not to be trusted".

So we have a detailed account of the residents 150 years ago and pictures of people of whom we know little taken about 1900, perhaps with help we can add something more to the record before time overtakes us all.

The Cambridgeshire Collection is in the middle of our busiest period of the year, As soon as the schools close for the Summer holidays the bright and keen students come in with their projects, then as the return to college comes nearer so the rest arrive, usually with their-mums,

Some topics are old-faithfuls, repeated year after year by students who are well-prepared and even have a check-list of sources - listed buildings registers, newspaper cuttings, pictures and directories - from which they will build up some account of the cottages in their village.

Except that often they will come up against a brick wall in their search for information on their timber-framed cottage as there are many topics for which there is no magic book, Some will continue up to the County Record Office and discover another wealth of sources enabling further pieces to be added to the jigsaw but all will score marks because they have visited the Library and experienced the fun and frustration of research.

Many other projects will be set by teachers who have not taken the opportunity to assess the resources beforehand and then we need to agonise with the student as to just what was required This is one reason we ask students to log in with their college and teacher's name so that we can have a quiet word and save everybody needless agony.

Generally "History" projects are relatively easy, it is the Geography or Business Studies courses which cause most problems. Fortunately two reports have just come out which will be particularly useful. A detailed Cambridge sub-regional shopping study by London consultants Hillier Parker indicates that whilst Peterborough has more retail floorspace it is Cambridge which is the premier shopping centre with a greater number of national multiples. It examines the two principal shopping areas, the historic centre and the Graf ton area concluding that the former has the wider range of retailers and more specialist and upmarket multiples.

However no major shop is entirely happy with its existing premises, none are trading at full capacity and the principal problems are the lack of quality parking or access for shoppers by bus and the absence of additional space for new shops - although the proposed relocation of Robert Sayle and redevelopment of Lion Yard and Bradwell's Court are seen as worth consideration. The possible impending demise of the Guildhall should local government reorganisation sweep away the City's powers might also be one way of bringing yet more specialist shopping to meet what is recognised to be the principal target area of growth - tourists and visitors as opposed to residents, All in all there are ample opportunities there for essays and projects.

A wider view comes from the County Council major study on the local Environment, The people who flock in with projects on pollution will find information in abundance in the sections on air, transport and water whilst those considering the possibility of new forms of energy generated from wind turbines or burning methane from landfill sites (though no mention of a straw-burning power station at Sutton) will find statistics to hand, Its 183 pages are packed with information, printed both sides of the page as one would expect from a document which analyses the problems of waste disposal, My problem is how to exploit its potential and how to find space to house them all – why is it that planning reports are always the thickest books we add to stock! Thank goodness they are probably the most used.

There is little doubt but that the theme this week must be milk. First there was a knock on the door just as we were finishing dinner one night and as a result the Collection is now the proud possessor of a copy of Chesterton R.D.C.'s "Regulations with respect to dairies, cowsheds and milkshops' issued in 1899. Then when browsing around a Cambridge bookshop I discovered an analysis of the art of C.E. Brock issued by The Press Art School about 1920.

The link between Brock and milk is obscure but revolves around a visit to what looked like & barn in a South Cambridgeshire village several years ago now. It was not a barn converted to a house but rather a house that looked just like a barn, made of concrete blocks and quite dissimilar from the neat properties around it. Inside we were made welcome and took a seat on a sofa in a room which might have been large but which was absolutely piled high with a jumble of tables, chairs and oddments resembling nothing less than a furniture scrapheap.

Then was paraded one by one several massive canvasses painted by Brock - panoramas, country scenes, a shepherd with his sheep and an interior of a cowshed with the animal being milked. The owners have now moved away and the pictures perhaps dispersed, all we have is the memory and a series of colour slides we took at the time. Now in the new accession there is a picture of Brock at work in his studio built in the garden of his Cambridge home and the large canvas at the back looks very similar to one of those we photographed that Sunday afternoon.

Brock's milkman, skilled though he undoubtedly was, might not have matched the excellence of Bert Wolfe and Jack Murfitt who in 1928 were judged the best milkmen in the Isle of Ely, helping to secure the Silver Challenge Cup for Bertram Parish of Front Street, Stretham for having the best and cleanest dairy in the county and although he slipped to second next year - behind F. Hephher of Aldreth - he was back on top in 1930, though chased hard by the dairy of F.C. Palmer of Haddenham, who still deliver milk around that village. The competition had been promoted by the Education committee to promote friendly competition, encourage greater consumption of milk and educate the farmers about the need for care and hygiene. But there were many variables to be taken into consideration as a don's wife discovered to her cost in 1924.

Agnes Sills and her husband, a Classical tutor of King's College, moved from their home on West Road to a newly built house on the Gog Magog Hills near Shelford, a quarter mile from the road down a private drive. For a while ail went well but with the outbreak of the Great War milk became scarce and the local dairy decided it was not worth them traipsing all the way up the hill when they could easily sell all their produce in the village. So, undaunted Agnes, started her own herd in the adjacent fields and soon found herself supplying local mothers and continued after the War-ended as milk was still in very short supply. All went well until a spot check revealed her milk to contain insufficient fat and she was summoned at Cambridge court. Allegations that she had watered the milk or was selling skimmed for the price of full-cream were rejected - the hillside was just too cold for the cows to thrive. Acquitted on the first occasion she was convicted a few months later on a similar charge and fined £5. Determined to prove the unfairness of the case she lobbied the Prime Minister and anybody she could find, and, feeling she had still got a rough ride published a book about it in 1931. Entitled 'There is John Bull to answer yet' it remains a rarity and we have only a photocopy - but who knows what tomorrow might bring in Trying to reflect on the highlights of the week at the start of lunch on Saturday there were various contenders. Was it to be the Cambridge United programmes collected on our behalf by their supporters and presented to my colleague on Thursday, the PhD dissertation on the Bassingbourn mystery plays produced by a student in Pittsburgh, USA, or the project on the Schlumberger centre compiled by a student from the Perse which earned an "A" grade in his GCSE, Then I passed a bookshop and the answer was obvious.

The highlight of the week, and probably the year, must be Sir Arthur Marshall's autobiography which charts the development of the firm which bears his family name. Marshall of Cambridge have been involved in virtually every British-built aircraft over the last 50 years. They designed and built the droop nose for Concorde, converted Hercules and TriStar aircraft and were prime movers in the early stages of the Bacon fuel cell which resulted in the American Apollo moon landings. All this is of course told in the book. But more than that they built the airport which is at the centre of the company's activities, produced buses and military vehicles and of course built up the chain of garages all of which has brought significant employment and prosperity to the area.

But as well as being the story of a firm this is also the tale of a man and his involvement with Cambridge. In fact it goes back even further for his father, David Marshall had been born in Cambridge in 1873, starting work as a porter in the kitchens of Trinity college and becoming Steward of the Pitt Club in Jesus Lane, one of the University's aristocratic and exclusive dining establishment. He soon expanded into chauffeur-driven hire cars with at one time no less than 14 millionaire undergraduate customers.

The firm moved to Jesus Lane in 1912 and it was here that the young Arthur made his first acquaintance with flying machines when the army airship "Beta II" taking part in army manoeuvres developed engine trouble and drifted over Cambridge out of control. Soldiers encamped on Midsummer Common helped bring the machine to ground and when repairs proved difficult the Captain ordered sufficient ballast to allow the airship to rise slightly when it was walked to a position immediately behind the Marshall garage where technicians repaired the engine whilst Arthur carried petrol and oil to refuel it. Later airman Rhodes Moorhouse landed his machine on Midsummer Common on a number of occasions and the nine-year old lad got permission to visit the old stable at Huntingdon where the aircraft was based. With such a background it is little wonder that Arthur himself learned to fly at an early age.

But the book is full of much more than aircraft and cars. Having left school Arthur Marshall attended university - Jesus college - in between the garage and the family home in Newmarket Road, effectively bridging the gap between Town and Gown. The story of Harold Abrahams and his triumphs at the Olympic Games in Paris has been recounted in "Chariots of Fire", Arthur Marshall was part of the British team and provides his own insights into the events. He was also involved in a railway accident when during the General Strike of 1926 he worked as a stoker to ensure the trains continued running. Steaming rapidly at 45 mph from Cambridge to Bishop Stortford they ran into the back of a passenger train which had left Cambridge three quarters of an hour before them, Testimony perhaps to the energy of the man and the remarkable nature of the tales he has recorded in this most interesting book

This has been a week when local historians have received their annual free gifts - except that they are of course not free but just part of the facilities they enjoy for their subscriptions to the Cambridge Antiquarian or Local History Societies. However with the modest fees already paid the arrival of the various journals are a distinct bonus,

The more senior is the Cambridge Antiquarian Society whose 1993 Proceedings - always somewhat behind the calendar - contain a variety of papers on pre-historic enclosures at Sawston, cropmarks at Harston and wapentake meeting-places around Cambridge for those fascinated by early forms of local government. The early development of Whaddon, Kanpwell and Wilburton comes under scrutiny in Sue Qosthuizen's study of Saxon commons in which she concludes that the initial settlement at Wilburton was in the area around the Burystead and that cottages grew up to the west of this with the church coming comparatively lately into the settlement, being constructed on less valuable and productive land. The development of Croxton is studied in some detail with a detailed plan of the settlement and garden remains and an analysis of the evidence concerning the establishment of a separate area called Westbury where the bulk of the old village properties were constructed and which spread north towards the main Cambridge to St Neots Road after the foundation of the latter as a new town between 1113 and 1122.

New large constructions needed bricks and Robin Lucas has investigated the foundation of an important brick and roof-tile manufacturing industry at Ely which flourished from the fifteenth to nineteenth centuries with bricks being sent along the fenland rivers to Kings Lynn and even Hunstanton. This obviously important industry has been little recorded previously and shows just what unexpected information might be located in local sources.

Meanwhile the Cambridgeshire Local History Society's "Review" includes a study of another local industry, the Cement works at Shepreth and in particular the strike which took place there between March 1925 and March 1926 during which a certain Col Tebbutt told his men that "starvation is what you need - starvation is a great incentive to work", only to be told that the time was soon coming when the workers would rule and that he should look to his own position, Co-incidentally another article concentrates on the development of almshouses for the poor and a third studies the effects of the Land Settlement Association on Fen Drayton between 1935 and 1988

An indication of the wide range of topics being researched and lectured upon is contained in the Autumn 1934 issue of "The Conduit", distributed (free) to members of both Societies and sold to others for £1.00 - the history of magic, early monastic libraries or evacuation to Warboys amongst them, along with the odd presentation on "Images of Cambridge" in connection with a book I will not mention further - except to say that the Library Shop has now received its consignment of - absolutely free - copies - which we will hopefully be able to sell and use the income to improve the facilities offered to our readers in the Cambridgeshire Collection,

An unexpected free perk for students of a Cambridge fee-paying school is revealed in their Prospectus, recently added to stock. The section on school meals explains that there are no facilities for providing a hot lunch for children but 'Most children in the infant or junior departments enjoy 1/3 pint of milk at break time'

An apparently unexciting source sometimes proves to have a particular interest.

One such is an article appearing in the journal "Medieval studies" as far back as 1971 which we have only recently tracked down. In it M.M. Sheehan examines dusty church registers which date back to the 1300s and from then unearths a mass of detail about the institution of marriage in those days. The process was established that the local priest would make a public announcement of a proposed marriage sufficiently in advance that anybody who saw reason to object could do so. Thus on three Sundays or major feasts the banns were read allowing friends or neighbours to report any impediments and also ensuring that there could be no claim of a clandestine marriage. Should no objections be raised then the couple solemnized their marriage by an exchange of consent at the church door, the giving of a ring, and then a nuptial mass in church,

However it was not always so straightforward. Betrothal which was followed by intercourse constituted a marriage even before the official service - which gave rise to many a claim and counter-claim as when William de Potton tried to avoid his responsibilities to Agnes Knotte by entering a monastery, only to have his sudden conversion to the faith rendered invalid by the court. John Draper of Cambridge found himself in difficulties in 1375 when both Agnes Durant and Alice Cakebred claimed him as her husband, both asserting that intercourse had taken place. John denied Agnes' claims but agreed to those of Alice and they went off to London where they were married without mentioning the spurned Miss Durant: After a while the newly-weds returned to Cambridge living as husband and wife only to find themselves arrested. Following an examination their marriage was annulled and five days later the court brought in a verdict in favour of the marriage of John to Agnes. One wonders what became of that union!

Bigamy was a significant problem, William Chitterne and Amicia Nene were married before the church and had lived together for two years when William seems to have got fed up. He worked out a tale with Joan Squire and then they went to court claiming they had been married previously and had children. The court believed the story and annulled the marriage to Amicia, declaring William and Joan to be husband and wife. It was not to have a happy ending for Joan soon went off and married another man leading the court to reopen the case and reinstate Amicia.

Zealous Bishops did all they could to see their flock married properly and investigate any claims of impropriety whether they came from gossiping neighbours or from one of the parties. If wrongdoing was revealed the couple could either choose to be legally married in church or accept a ruling that any further sexual union would ipso facto constitute marriage. One such case involved Thomas Barbo and Joan Seustere who had been his long-time mistress. Joan claimed they had been married at Stourbridge Fair and asked the court to declare Thomas her husband. Thomas however claimed he had not actually promised to marry her but merely intended to continue their earlier relationship. So the court ruled that one more act of intercourse would constitute formal marriage and twenty-five months later Joan was able to finally get her man,

Reflections 1994 10 19

Two of the most recent publications from Cambridge University Press might seem destined never to become popular best sellers, but are in fact very entertaining.

One is principally devoted to fifty speeches in Latin, proclaiming the qualities of various distinguished people on the occasion of their receiving Honorary Degrees. I gave up Latin as far as I recollect in class 2S at Soham Grammar School and would have profound difficulty in understanding "uel nutum, cum quassaueris, pultis coagulatae" especially when applied to the work of a distinguished mathematician - about which subject I know even less.

Fortunately however there is a translation which shows it to refer to Sir Michael Atiyah's achievements in propounding a new theory which would allow him to map "the mesmerizing wobble of a jelly undulating". All this is contained in "Cambridge Orations 1982-1993" which includes an introduction sketching the development of the important post of University Orator, first established about 1521 to ensure that there was somebody properly able to beg, beseech or implore the Monarch or other important people to bestow or confirm University privileges.

The position was not always one to be coveted even though it granted the holder various perks and a small salary, but on other occasions the election was fully contested with hundreds of Members of the Senate journeying to Cambridge especially to register their vote for either their own or their college's preferred candidate. However in 1673 one election returned 121 votes for one candidate against 98 for his opponent who was, nonetheless, declared elected.

Similar vagaries of University politics are explored in the second book which explains the background and significance of another work whose relevance had long eluded me, In 1908 Francis Cornford had published "Microcosmographia Academica", supposedly the most amusing piece of Cambridge satire published that decade. However to appreciate the satire one must understand something of the thing being mocked and this present book examines the issues confronting the University establishment at the turn of the century.

In those days all candidates seeking to take a degree needed a proficiency in three core subjects, mathematics, Latin and Greek, They also needed to satisfy a tutor of their good moral character and had a parent or guardian who was able to afford the payment of the college accounts. An undergraduate would need in 1902 anything between £40 and £75 to cover settling-in costs and then an income of between £107 and £225 to meet recurrent annual expenditure - something around £7,850 at today's prices - and this at a time when a good professional salary was around £500 a year with many families earning less than a tenth of that.

However as the century wore on and fewer schools actually taught Greek to their pupils it reduced the numbers who could meet basic entrance requirements. Thus the University debated whether to abandon this condition of entry, especially as it developed its own science-based studies. Would this not make the University a "glorified technical college" and would the Corporation of Cambridge give them funding to establish courses in brewing and metallurgy as other benefactors had done for provincial Universities,

The debate was long and hard and is chronicled in "University politics" along with other contentious subjects including the admission of women and the role of the established church, to provide an entertaining account of something which might otherwise be all Greek to majority of us,

"Cambridge orations 1982-1933" by James Diggle & "University politics" by Gordon Jackson both published by CUP

Reflections 1994 10 26

The project was well structured and the questions clear; it would be undertaken by dozens of students. The only problem was how to provide the necessary material to enable it to be answered.

First one has to choose a site - our enquirer had elected to study the area of Lion Yard.

Question one ; look at all the changes which have taken place to the site over the years - new buildings, demolition, growth of an area, changes to use or redevelopment ... use photos, maps etc to emphasise or show what you mean.

Maps present few problems - the area has been surveyed quite well in 1574, 1688, 1798, 1886, 1901, 1926, 1952, 1967 and by the Goad shopping survey in 1993. Together they present a picture of the development and decline over the centuries. However if lots of students are likely to choose the same site then it would be quicker for them and us if we photocopy the relevant sections of the maps so that they do not have to be got out and put away dozens of times.

Pictures however are more of a problem for one would need to check not only for views of Petty Cury but also of Alexandra Street, Falcon Yard, St Tibbs Row and anything else which had stood there, Fortunately by scanning the pages of "Cambridge in pictures 1888-1988" and the newly-published "Images of Cambridge" we can find enough to cover the last century or so - and again it will save everybody's time if we photocopy them and put them in a folder.

Question two; what has caused the changes to happen - there are usually reasons behind any change, they may be economic social or political or a combination of them; whatever the reason you will need to explain it

So why did the open spaces of 1574 become the slum areas of 1850 - and where can one find proof that they were indeed slums. The latter is easy for the Cambridge Chronicle reported in 1850 just how bad the Falcon Yard area was - its just a case of finding the article - more photocopying will save extensive use of newspapers or microfilm. Then the Victorians rebuilt it creating new shopping and office areas, their buildings became old and following the failure of the German airforce to devastate central Cambridge in 1940s the planners had their turn a decade or two later - it was after all planned to be the biggest redevelopment in England if one omitted the blitzed cities. Tracking all this down however means lots of plodding through lots of planning reports - the least we can do is to suggest a reading list.

So far so good, thinking it through with the student who obviously knew what he was supposed to do only took an hour or so, but the production of the guides and the photocopying took about two days. All this for one question that might contribute up to 15 marks for one student in one GCSE project in one class of one school.

The project had been well thought through by the person planning it – but why had it not been talked through with the people who have to try and assist those who are answering it. At least we have the material but colleagues throughout the country are being inundated by this type of project for which there are no published sources. It adds up to frustration for librarian and student alike, but at least one lad has the chance of getting his marks

The latest addition to the run of "Chronicles" - transcripts of stories from the Cambridge paper of that name between 1770 and 1899 - covers the village of Hinxton. It contains the usual mixture of sales, news, court, cases and fascinating facts and is made even more interesting by the addition of other information culled from a variety of other sources and documents by its compiler, Mary Symonds,

So often when researching local history every story recorded prompts a dozen other questions and they are several here, involving riots, highway robbery and burglary - why was Richard Poulter acquitted when he was placed at the scene of the crime and the stolen items found in his chicken shed, especially when he had been heard confessing to his father?

There is one case in particular where Miss Symonds has turned Miss Marples in order to seek out the background of a question of child neglect. It involves three principal characters - a mother, a nurse and her sister, On 18th June 1876 spinster Annie Maria Redding of Church Street Chesterton was delivered of a son. Soon after it was born it was taken by the nurse, Esther Larkins, to be reared by her sister Mrs Sarah Tabor of Hinxton in return for payment of

£1 a week. But when Annie saw her child in October it looked very ill and died on 17th November. Esther was charged with manslaughter. At the court case evidence was given that the baby had not been healthy, had a bad cough and used to throw up its food. Sarah had fed it with milk and water, baked flour and boiled bread, a diet agreed by the doctor she called in when the baby showed signs of weakness. However the surgeon who had delivered the child claimed it had been healthy at birth and in his opinion had died through lack of food. At death it had weighed less than six pounds, about a third of what should have been expected, its body was emaciated and the skin just hung in folds, The jury's verdict was not guilty and Esther was discharged,

Miss Symonds turned to church registers, census returns and directories to piece together other facts. She found that the mother Annie had previously had another illegitimate child - and that this child had died of atrophy -defined as a wasting disease (or starvation). Its death had been witnessed by the same Esther Larkins into whose care the new baby had been entrusted. Why then had the mother used the same nurse again. Annie was a music teacher and would have had little income, could Annie not keep up the necessary payments or was there perhaps an understanding between mother and nurse that she should do the right thing at the right time?

Esther Larkins had lost her mother when 12, & had to wash, cook and clean for her widowed father and sisters. In 1853 she had married a widower with two children but had none of her own, Perhaps, Miss Symonds speculates, Esther lacked maternal feelings which would have accounted for the ignorance and indifference with which she had mishandled Annie Redding's infants. Her sister Sarah also married - a widower old enough to be her father - but still able to produce three children, two of whom seem to have died in infancy.

So what of the mother? Just a few months after all the gossip and speculation attending the trial she married a bootmaker at Hills Road Wesleyan Chapel and they had a daughter. By 1891 Annie was on her own but then disappears from local records – perhaps the husband had moved away to find work and they'd started a new life of happiness in a place where her misfortune would be unknown – perhaps there is another mystery to be unravelled.

In a week or so we will be invaded; the village college minibus will deposit students in central Cambridge and 40 of them will ascend to the Cambridgeshire Collection. Fortunately they will be in parties of ten and their teachers will have assisted us to be ready for them. Laid out in our Teaching Area will be items selected by their staff which summarise some of the issues on which they have to base their assessment of an topic of some concern to minibus drivers and others - the traffic situation in Cambridge.

This year as well as the newspaper cuttings and the planning reports there will be additional items for the teachers to consider. One is the new book "Images of Cambridge" which includes details of the development of the northern and western bypasses, the dualling of East Road, pedestrianisation and park'n'ride and the other - more planning reports.

Recently three more have been received in the Cambridgeshire Collection, one from the Guildhall, one from the Shire Hall and the other from the Oxfam shop.

From the city council has come the latest stage in the formulation of the Cambridge local plan, nearly 200 pages on the environment, housing, employment, shopping and traffic management stating council objectives & the way it will try to achieve them. Thus they seek to make greater use of existing railway lines, introduce bus lanes, investigate road pricing, traffic calming and the encouragement of cycle lanes and park and ride. This latter is the subject of the latest County reports which examine in great detail a proposal for a new park and ride site at Madingley road, in accordance with the County structure plan policies and including details of the environment impact as well as the amount of traffic currently using that road.

The Oxfam shop report however takes the traffic problem backwards, not forwards, to September 1954 when the Minister of Housing and Local Government had just decided his policy on the 1947 County Development Plan. One of the most important issues was a "spine relief road" which would be built from Histon Road into the town centre, crossing Midsummer Common, Jesus Lane and Christ's Pieces. This had been proposed by the County as a way of relieving the congestion of local traffic. It had been opposed by the University, some colleges and by the City council who preferred to widen existing central streets. The Minister noted that the City was planning to build a multi-storey garage in the proposed Guildhall street area and hoped that this proceed as speedily as possible (in fact Lion Yard car park did not open till the 1970s). He also considered that traffic was likely to increase and a new road would be an unavoidable necessity.

However the politician recognised that the scheme was controversial and that there was no prospect of it being built in the foreseeable future - indeed it would need Government approval which was unlikely to be granted! Perhaps the student traffic studiers can understand the thinking behind the decision and the reaction it caused.

With the report are a few typewritten notes outlining somebody's ideas - ring roads, a new bridge (Elizabeth Way opened 1971) and a final thought which reads 'Helicopter Station: a portion of Midsummer Common might be scheduled for use. Some provision will be necessary' - something both city and county planners seem to have overlooked since 1954!

Reflections 1994 11 16

In June 1932 a small band of academics gathered in the Upper Parlour of Peterhouse and, like all good university scholars, formed themselves in to a committee. Unlike many committees however they actually did things and for eight years were active in Researching the fenland investigating early life in such an inhospitable landscape, the extinct forests which had one covered large tracts of the area or the history of the formation of the North Sea.

Amongst its members were people destined to become Professors of Archaeology and Botany and the water transport manager of the Ely sugar beet factory, Major Gordon Fowler. Once a site had been located members of the committee would be informed by telephone and next day with gum-boots, spades and peat-indifferent clothing a small party would rendezvous at some agreed point before venturing out to investigate, measure and photograph. It was an exciting period and many important discoveries were made but then came the Second World War and the group never reformed.

In 1976 a Fenland Field Officer was appointed to undertake a preliminary archaeological survey of the Cambridgeshire fenland. By now much of the peat soil which had formerly covered the fens had eroded or been ploughed away and so there was a possibility that something of the earliest settlements might be revealed. The results however surpassed their wildest expectations, It lead to a comprehensive programme of fieldwalking -ideally on overcast but bright days when the ground was unfrozen but ploughed and weathered and without crops, Up and down field after field they walked noticing pottery from Roman, Bronze Age or Neolithic periods, flints, arrowheads, axes, plotting them on maps as they walked and then at the end of every day writing it all up. For seven years they walked and searched, few other areas have been so extensively surveyed, and none so large, The record will survive as the physical remains of the fenland perish year by year.

Now some results and interpretation of the finds has been published by English Heritage. Flint axes from Fordham, pottery from Isleham, burial mounds from Haddenham or earthworks from Wardy Hill all contribute their paragraph to a comprehensive survey of Fenland in the centuries before the drainage of the seventeenth centuries.

The banks of the Fenland rivers and drains which had to be raised up as the adjacent fen land shrank provided important roadways more easily passable than the muddy droves whilst barges plied along the rivers delivered goods and crops to the area. However once the bitter weather turned water to ice and the river traffic ceased so fenmen found themselves with a new highway which would enable them to travel many miles far more easily than at other times. By strapping skates to their feet they could race railway trains and certainly beat the challenge of any foreigner who ventured into their home territory during the speed skating championships which were held on patches of ice specially frozen for the sport.

The story of the skaters of Welney area in Victorian times has now been told by Hilary Winter, a descendent of Turkey, Fish and James Smart and includes an account of a near tragedy in 1881 when a saboteur struck at the race course at Bury fen. Turkey agreed to work through the night to prepare another, all he needed was ten helpers and a barrel of beer, All night they laboured and worked up a terrible thirst, only to discover that, the beer had frozen hard in the barrel. But by cuddling the frozen barrel to their sweating bodies the beer thawed and, once flowing, was never again given the chance of freezing!

Recently we've been indulging in what old fen folk might call "devil-dodging" with a talk in Lt Thetford church being followed by another in Haddenham Baptist Chapel and a third in Sutton Methodists. In each case one might say it was a full house - most pews were taken and between them three congregations had benefited to the tune of something over £700. It is a particularly satisfying way of using material from the Cambridgeshire Collection for the benefit of the local community, whose members assist us to collect and preserve items on their locality,

For many people the past comes most immediately to life when they can see how it impacted on families who formerly lived and worked in their village or town. Thus the 1947 flood photographs that are most moving are those which show people returning by boat the wreckage of their homes - not that such disasters are confined to present times as a letter written in 1809 gives testimony when high water allied to a strong gale produced "a spectacle to be contriv'd but not properly described; the waters rolled over the banks in a truly terrible state and the distress of the inhabitants of the Fens was pitable to a great degree"

But life could be hard even in the best of times as is recounted by the correspondent to the "Morning Chronicle" of 1850 whose words feature in the "Webbed feet to green wellies" talk, Writing of Witchford "which in point of filth would bear comparison with the worst place in any part of the Kingdom" the writer described one of the dwellings in which six of the occupants had been struck with disease. Upstairs four beds were crammed in one room about 14 feet by 10. The sides of the room were sloping and the width of the ceiling no more than six feet. In one bed lay the father who had been confined with the fever for six weeks and in an adjoining bed lay his 12 year old daughter. The remaining beds together with the unoccupied portion of those in which the victims of the fever lay were occupied at night by the wife and the remaining five children, the eldest boy being 14 and his sister two years older.

Should such hovels remain today they will probably have been renovated and knocked together with adjacent properties to provide home for one or two people who would perhaps not care to know something of the history of their home!

Others are happy not to have the encumbrance of firm foundations and the benefits of a travelling life have been described by youngsters in "Common Ground", published by the County Team for Traveller Education. Donna describes how her family of eight live in a caravan, "There are only two beds, Mum and Dad have the bedroom, Alex and Adam have the other bed, Bridie and me have to sleep on a bunk, Joe and Sean are up in Leeds, They come down for holidays", But one of the benefits of a trailer - as expressed by Debbie is "We can travel All around the world, We're free to go places and have fun on the way", There are disadvantages however "In winter we freeze up, the door gets stuck freezing up like ice, Its scary when the wind blows, the trailer rocks backwards and forwards, the rain keeps tapping on the roof, the rain drips in", At the other extreme "When its hot, sweating, Hot as an oven, We open all the windows, Lots more showers or cold cold baths in the shed, Where it's nice and clean" – and they can up and run when the floods come!

Reflections 1994 11 30

For hundreds of years wars have been raging in Cambridge which have gone unknown by mere mortals; whilst academics disputed amongst themselves over scientific discoveries, mayors and chancellors petitioned parliaments for their respective rights and undergraduates battled townies for control of the streets much more important issues have been decided by tooth and claw.

Now for the first time the story of the most important of Cambridge institutions has been told, a story that has taken not one volume but two, each author unearthing something missed by the other and sometimes disagreeing over fundamentals - can for example the phrase "growing old gracefully" properly be applied to one with a reputation for promiscuity whose fifty offspring are scattered around the globe, who shrieks furiously as she beats the living daylights out of her neighbour and is remembered for drinking bathwater ?

But such behaviour can perhaps be appreciated when one considers the background. How would you react if your offspring was run over by a car then buried by a stranger in the mistaken belief that it was one of his own family, the error only becoming apparent after he had left for Italy.

Such are some of the traumas of being a college cat. There are of course compensations. Sprocket of Fitzwilliam has been nominated for Junior-President and has his own column in the college magazine whilst Benson of Jesus is formally acknowledged to be the official college cat and able to benefit from a feline felicity fund set up to satisfy her alimentary requirements. Others such as Bossuet from Caius prefers stale water and bacon whilst Caiaphas of St John's has been known to consume the cold beef reserved for High Table and Sprocket of Fitzwilliam dines on pork or chicken.

But the principal impression is one of inter-college and internal college rivalry, Thus in Pembroke Thomasina, Socks and Puss maintain an uneasy relationship, perhaps united to a degree in their opposition to the college ducks whilst Caiaphas of St John's has no compunction about invading other's territory and has not only had to be retrieved from Caius, Churchill and Kings but also disrupted chapel services by running around and making the choristers giggle.

The biggest, college, Trinity, has the largest concentration of cats, Burnage, Armin and Muffet are a turbulent trio who live together in Cloister court, although not entirely amicably. Just along the court Darius and Jedburgh were found cowering in the bathtub following an attack by yet another cat, Stevenson, who had to be beaten off with a broom handle and whose owner supplied an hydraulic water pistol as a deterrent to future incidents. Jedburgh has lost her sight in an accident but can still find her way around college and is pictured by Richard Surman in "College cats of Oxford & Cambridge". But another Trinity moggy, Titan, totally eluded him. However Tony Jedrej, press photographer that he is, has included five exclusive snaps in his survey of "Cambridge cats" as well as tracking down others which find themselves omitted from "College cats". Both cost the same, both cover the same subject, both are essential additions to any cat-lovers library though the argument about which is the best picture of which puss will doubtless fuel many decades between cat-naps over Christmas

In 1849 Edward Smith found himself obliged to make an apology to the people of Fen Ditton for some injudicious remark he had made about the young wife of the old Rector two years earlier. The aggrieved lady had taken her complaint to the Ecclesiastical Court and their judgement was that Smith should make public penance in the parish church at morning service. Never-had the church been fuller - in fact it was estimated that 3,000 thronged to witness the sight, ranging from the most respectable of the county to the lowest, scum of Barnwell. By the time it came to open the doors there was an almighty crush and every available space in the church was soon taken, people sitting on the chancel screen and standing in the pews, whilst others shinned up the outside and smashed their way in through the windows,

Any attempt to conduct a proper service was soon abandoned as the preacher found his voice drowned by cat-calls, whistles and laughter. Loud shouts announced the arrival of the penitent Smith who had to be carried to the spot where he was to deliver his apology to the Rector's wife, now terror-stricken. No sooner had he started his recantation than hassocks started to fly as thick as hail and several people seized the bell ropes causing a violent jangling which was, however, completely drowned by the din raging below. Eventually, duty done, Smith was carried from the church on men's shoulders amidst hearty cheers and paraded in triumphant procession through the village to the Plough Inn where his admirers spent the rest of the afternoon drinking and smoking whilst Smith sneaked off home. Meanwhile the Rector and his wife made their way to the Rector followed by a howling mob who stoned and smashed every window in the house.

All Smith had done was to speak some words he should not have done - what more apology should one give not to have spoken any words at all when the good people of Chesterton Local History Society had gathered expecting them? It was a foggy night, it had been a busy day, but just why the date had not found its way into my work diary is a mystery and the little black book which usually accompanies me everywhere had gone missing in July, only to reappear yesterday.

Locking up in the local gaol might seem a due penalty, but fortunately the Gaol on Castle Hill - once within Chesterton parish - has now closed, Something of its past has however been revealed in a series of tales of Cambridgeshire crimes just published. They include Thomas Weems of Godmanchester who murdered his wife and was hanged in August 1819, his body-taken down and subjected to electric shocks in the University labs in Corn Exchange Street. Nobody hanged for the murder of Policeman Richard Peak of Wicken in 1855 - but then nobody has found the body and the crime is still unsolved (I was told that police are still seeking a 200 year-old man to assist them in their enquiries) but the murderer of Emma Rolfe on Midsummer Common in 1876 confessed readily. Brought together by a former Police Inspector they make gory reading and may well make an interesting evening for Chesterton local historians.

For the moment however they can look forward to the story of Cambridge water and the Riverside Tunnel project, the exploits of a blue-badge guide and Bye-gones evening with Dan Jackson. Meetings are held at St Andrew's School, Chesterton on the third Monday of each month and everybody is welcome, a claim I will test on the 12th December when I will make my apology in person

A new Library exhibition featuring the combined resources of the County's Heritage officers brings together a variety of materials reflecting one common theme - Fighting over Cambridgeshire - a particularly apt topic in this period of debate over the future of Local Government, But this time the conflicts depicted are much wider with the Archaeologists concentrating on warfare between the Iron Age and late medieval period, the Archivists on the period between the Armada and the Great War, which is featured by our own displays whilst the Conservation department includes Nuclear War buildings. The Folk Museum panels concentrate on the Second World War with stories of land girls, home guard and Civil Defence.

Every war has its heroes and its villains, which is which depends on your standpoint as is reflected in three recent- books.

Michael Bentinck has no doubt in which category his father belongs, "My Dad, my Hero" tells the story of a Cambridge lad, born on St George's Day 1921 who joined the Territorials when aged 18 and soon found himself shipped out to Singapore alongside his mates in the Cambridgeshire regiment. They arrived in time for the final battle and captivity in Changi gaol. Soon like thousands of others he was sent to work on the "Death Railway" and to endure the hardships and horrors of hard labour in a harsh climate with brutal guards. Somehow he survived and returned safely home only to have to recommence the battle for survival, this time fighting not the Japanese but the tropical worms which had entered his bloodstream, He forgave his captors and returned to the scene of his experiences before dying in 1990 - a hero indeed.

Others too travelled thousands of miles to fight. Amongst them were the young Americans of the 355th Fighter Group who arrived in the small Cambridgeshire parish of Steeple Morden in 1943 and were billeted in local homes. They found English ways strange and villagers viewed them with suspicion but soon they formed friendships and romances on the ground whilst, in the air they flew Thunderbolts and Mustangs to escort the Flying Fortress and Liberator Bombers who were carrying the war deep into Germany. Their names and their stories of that frightening time has been told in "Steeple Morden strafers" which goes beyond the fighting to paint a picture of the impact of the arrival of such a strange though friendly invasion on a small group of Cambridgeshire villages, Many of them too were heroes,

Other villages were also being disrupted by the arrival of strangers, In the Isle of Ely the evacuees scrambled from places felt to be at threat of enemy bombing were largely Jewish, in a scheme promoted by James de Rothschild, the Isle's Liberal MP. Meanwhile the MP's cousin, Victor, was playing his part in the war effort. Throughout the 1930s many had watched the rise of Fascism with distain with members of the Jewish community particularly concerned for the fate of their brethren in Germany.

To stop Hitler would need the support of the Soviet Union and Victor Rothschild, a member of the wealthy banking family, was uniquely placed to assist that cause. His arrival as an undergraduate at Trinity in 1930 brought him into contact with Anthony Blunt who introduced him to members of the Apostles club, including Guy Burgess and Kim Philby. Together they rose to senior positions in the war-time British intelligence service, able with their scientific training to understand latest developments and able also to keep their Russian allies appraised of them. Once the war ended and allies became enemies the intelligence gathering continued - or so it is claimed by Roland Perry in "The fifth man". Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher attended a memorial service for Victor Rothschild in May 1990 - but was she honouring a hero or villain?

{p. xi} Some of the key information. in this book came from interviewees - scientists, politicians, diplomats, businessmen and intelligence agents - who did not wish to be acknowledged, for understandable reasons. ...

I am grateful particularly to my contacts in British Intelligence ... they were responsible for leading me to a key revelation in 1978, which finally fitted the Fifth Man jigsaw in the 1990s. Thanks also to my CIA contacts ...

Acknowledgement must also go to the seven main KGB respondents ...

Documentary film-maker, Jack Grossman, who fought with both the {p. xii} RAF in the Second World war, and the Haganah after it, was of assistance with background and Israeli Intelligence. ... Appreciation for explanations of some of the more esoteric bomb and radar technology goes to Sir Mark Oliphant ...

{p. xx} The Fifth provided Stalin almost on a daily basis with what Churchill and Roosevelt were saying about the USSR. The spy also had particular links to the US military and intelligence during and after the war.

His work and that of the others in the ring went on for longer than originally believed by investigators. They were all involved in spying for the Russians before, during and after the war. Their espionage was wide-ranging and included the 1943 Anglo-American discussions on the opening of a second front in the west; information on major war projects such as the atomic bomb and biological weapons; data on Eastern European nations in exile in London (who were anti-Stalin); background to discussions on the post-war Marshall Plan to redevelop Western Europe. Furthermore, while calling the Five a 'ring' implies they worked

{p. xxi} together, they mainly operated independently of each other. However, at times two or more would combine. Often their linking revolved around Blunt, who was the middleman most closely in contact with Soviet Controls in London from 1942 to 1963, the year Philby defected and Blunt was exposed to MI5 investigators.

Another important clue, on which those who knew the Fifth Man's identity all agreed, was that after his main spying days for the KGB finished in the UK in 1963, he went on to have a 'successful career' in both business and public life.

This again cut down the list.

Apart from fitting the many facts and dues to the Fifth Man jigsaw, intangibles such as motivation were vital. This had to go beyond the altruistic obligations of those who felt it their duty to defend Western civilization against Hitler's barbarity. The spy in question had to be inspired on a higher level than his belief, shared with the others in the Ring of Five, that Soviet Marxist ideology was superior and would eventually dominate Western capitalist democracies.

The Fifth Man's original motive was survival, for himself, family, race, and country. He was compelled to supply the Soviet Union with information that would smash Hitler, for over the duration of the war its people were prepared to sacrifice and suffer more than any other to defeat him. But after the war, the Fifth Man's ideological commitment caused him to go on spying for the KGB. In so doing, he became caught in a web of betrayal and tragedy, which lasted half a century.

The Fifth Man was Nathaniel Mayer Victor Rothschild (1910 to 1990), better known as the third Lord Rothschild. He was the British head of the famous banking dynasty, which apart from prolific achievements in art, science, wine and charity, had shaped recent history by such acts as the financing of the British army at the Battle of Waterloo and the purchasing of the Suez Canal for Great Britain and Prime Minister Disraeli.

Victor Rothschild's purpose was to go a step further and change the course of history ...

{p. xxxiv} ... Rothschild had been on the inside through the war until 1945, and since then on the outside as an intelligence man who had a unique relationship with his wartime employer. He had left them officially, yet unofficially still ran agents after the war in Israel, Iran, China and other nations from 1945 to at least 1969. He was the classic outsider-insider. His special place in the Establishment as a power-broker, with unsurpassed connections in every major institution in Britain, allowed him to bypass the usual restrictions on lesser-born citizens. He couldn't actually pull the files in M15 or M16, but he could always find someone who would do it for him, if he needed access. Rothschild was a regular visitor to British Intelligence offices. He lunched and dined constantly with its directors at his favourite pubs, Pratt's and White's, and always made it a pleasure when he picked up the tab for expense account-conscious spy chiefs.

Rothschild had been on intimate terms with most of them: Guy Liddell, Roger Hollis, Dick White, Maurice Oldfield. He became a sort of father confessor, someone who understood the machinations of intelligence and was compassionate about the chiefs' problems in defending the realm. Rothschild was always there to give sound advice, or pick up the phone to help with a contact. In dealing with directors-general, he transformed from an aloof, even sullen character to an effusively charming, extremely helpful and trusted friend. The demure, introverted lord vaporized and was replaced by the communicative fixer.

Rothschild provided relief for intelligence chiefs from the pressures of the office. He was the confidant with whom they could share the intrigues of the espionage game. In their time, every one of them in varying degrees had divulged the key intelligence secrets to him, the ones which the Russians were after.

In 1958, Rothschild's fostering of Peter Wright turned quickly to patronage on the basis that they were scientists who got on awfully well. Wright was an easy prey for the sophisticated peer. Although talented, Wright was not Oxbridge educated and therefore an outsider in a service which was run by the old-school ties. He felt snubbed by those too ignorant to comprehend his great value in the intelligence war. Wright was also ambitious, prepared to put in many hours of overtime to achieve his goals, whether it was developing a new device, or gaining an expanded budget. His

{p. xxxv} diligence and intelligence may have been unsettling to those used to the antiquated methods of defending HM, the realm and the masses.

Not so with ebullient Victor, who took him under his golden wing. For the first time in his professional life, Wright felt wanted, understood and appreciated. In this atmosphere, Wright spilled everything that was happening inside MI5. Rothschild offered help. He was in the oil group Shell, overseeing scientific development. He seconded staff to MI5. Wright told him about every piece of espionage technology under development. Rothschild offered ideas of his own and actually devised some new technology himself. He made introductions to heads of major British organizations like the AWRE (Atomic Weapons Research Establishment), which led to further expansion of MI5's R & D.

This new, powerful chum, who impressed Wright more than anyone else in his life, was in effect responsible for expanding British Intelligence budgets. This was an individual to be almost worshipped, especially in the niggardly world of Whitehall departments. It was damned hard to convince the bean-counters that Intelligence needed more funds. Why should we give you more money? the Government accountants would ask. The war is over. We're not under threat, are we?

Here was a noble obliged, apparently by his breeding, conscience and generosity, to dispense largesse and influence for the good of the services, and the nation. This way, Rothschild developed enormous goodwill within and without the services. No one was respected more, not just amongst the worker bees such as Wright and Arthur Martin, or the chiefs. Captains of industry, mandarins of Whitehall, ministers of the crown and successive prime ministers knew of his help and activity. Many wanted his services, but until 1970 - apart from the occasional Government committee - Rothschild preferred to keep the mystique of the outsider-insider and a little distance from those with whom he worked and consulted in Intelligence. His job at Shell, particularly from 1958 to 1969, allowed him all the freedom of activity and travel he desired.

It's accepted among MI5 agents that during the 1945 to 1963 period, the Russians were receiving vital information which enabled them to thwart British operations run against the Soviet Embassy and the KGB. All Russian interviewees said that the Moscow Centre received the data. Ex-KGB Colonels 'F' and 'B' and Modin admitted

{p. xxxvi} that the Fifth Man was at least prominent in gathering the data and informing the Russians about MI5 missions.

All through the post-war years to 1963, the Fifth Man was active in passing on vital information about MI5's plans and projects concerning the Russians and the KGB. Because of the failures, breakdown, conflict and fear this caused within British Intelligence everyone on the inside believed that MI5 had been penetrated by someone. The inference was always that it had to be an insider. But as this book will show it wasn't Hollis or Mitchell. Even one of the leading Russian double agents working for MI6, Oleg Gordievsky, who defected to Britain in 1985, denied that the Russians had anyone of importance on the inside of MI5 in the contentious years from 1945 to 1963.

Wright, Martin and the various committees over the decades that chased around the British Intelligence maze searching for a mole, did not consider that he or she never existed. If that was correct, and all the evidence overwhelmingly suggested it was, then there was never penetration. In that case, the Fifth Man had to be an outsider who looked in often enough and listened with an expert technical ear hard enough to be more effective in compromising British Intelligence than any insider, including Philby, and for far longer.

Modin and ex-KGB Colonels 'F' and 'B' confirmed that the Fifth Man worked in tandem with the Fourth Man, Blunt, who after 1945 was the key middleman, the main receiver of espionage data from the Fifth Man and others to be passed on to the KGB Controls. That is why, under interrogation in 1964, Blunt made much of the definition of the word spying. No, he confessed, he had not spied for Russia, lately.

'Lately' implied after 1945. He, Burgess and Philby and several others interrogated, sang the same refrain. They had all done the right thing by the Allies, who included the Russians, in the Second World War by passing on information to the Moscow Centre in the drive to defeat Hitler. But they claimed they had not continued after 1945.

This was inaccurate. According to Modin and several other KGB agents, all of the Ring of Five went on operating after the war, in increasingly dangerous circumstances, as did many of the second-rank spies such as Cairncross (which Cairncross denies). Modin has become an unofficial spokesperson for Russian Intelligence in recent {p. xxxvii} years. His status in KGB ranks and fame in the West is based on running the Ring of Five after 1945. He did not take up residence in Britain until 1947.

THE FUELS OF WAR

In the late 1950s, the Cold War was in deep freeze as the clandestine techno-battle expanded between the USSR and the West. The US was using Britain as a floating aircraft carrier in its preparation for an expected conflict with the Communists, which the Americans wished to confine, if that were possible, to Europe. US bomb, defence, military and communications bases linked with British bases and formed a mosaic across the length and breadth of the country.

The Moscow Centre knew about every extension to the Anglo-American network, and planned to counter it. At first it didn't know how this could be done without detection. Many Anglo-American military installations were placed in obscure locations in the country.

An ingenious suggestion to the KGB Controls from one of their British agents was that a petrol retail outlet chain should be set up. Pump stations could be built on back roads near the installations and could be used to spy on the network by, for instance, intercepting the microwave communications between bases. In preparation for war, the pump outlets could be taken over by special Soviet military forces in order to destroy the bases.

The idea seemed outstanding in principle, but any Russian-controlled company selling petrol would have to appear legitimate to fool the CIA and British Intelligence. The Russians had never set up such a capitalist enterprise before. It would have to compete with major Western retail corporations in Britain. Specialist products would have to be developed by scientists. Marketing and distribution know-how would be needed.

By coincidence or otherwise, Rothschild joined Shell in 1958 in a relatively lowly job as a part-time adviser to its research section. He immediately made his presence felt and his role was quickly expanded.

A year later, Nafta Great Britain, a Soviet retail outlet chain began operations in the UK. By the early 1960s, it was competing {p. xxxviii} with the bigger Western companies. Its marketing strategy was unique in the business. Nafta set up pump stations on out-of-the-way B roads, far from the population centres and competitive outfits such as Shell and Mobil. The Russian company's managers claimed that it would compete where the big boys would not bother to go. Scores of these Nafta stations never made money in the thirty years they were open for business. They were suspiciously close to the most important defence installations in Britain.

Was Rothschild the mastermind behind Nafta? The timing for his move to Shell and the creation of the Russian company would suggest he was a prime suspect. So would his background. He had investigated commercial espionage early in his career at MI5. As its security officer during the war, he learned all there was to know about how to steal equipment and documents. Rothschild's scientific expertise also made him a candidate as Nafta's founder. His early work at Shell covered research into gas, oil, petroleum, diesel engine fuel oil and several other products, all of which were found among Nafta's offerings to the British market. But he didn't restrict his interest to science and research. Fellow executives at Shell were stunned by his inquisitiveness in all fields from production to packaging, distribution, marketing and advertising.

His great hunger for knowledge allowed him to absorb it all, and his skills did not go unnoticed at Shell. He gained quick promotion. By 1963, he was Shell's scientific research and development supremo worldwide, even though the company never quite sorted out whether their distinguished lord was a full-time employee or not. His power and position allowed him to be around when he liked, which gave him the chance to carry on his clandestine activities, such as running agents for Dick White in Israel, Iran and China. The Shell position was just right as a cover for his frequent travels to the Middle East, where the company produced its raw petroleum.

THE FOUR-DECADE SMOKE SCREEN

After Burgess and Maclean defected to Russia in 1951, Rothschild spent the next four decades - the rest of his life - covering trails which linked him to them as the Fifth Man.

Internal British

{p. xxxix} Intelligence investigations began in late 1951, and like every other person connected to the defectors, he was questioned. It was mild then, but when Philby defected in 1963, and Blunt 'confessed' in exchange for immunity from prosecution in 1964, the interrogations increased.

Many, including Rothschild, took Blunt's lead and opted for the immunity card. Some made the deal which prevented prosecution then made certain admissions, such as 'yes, I passed on data to people like Blunt during the war, but never to the Russians directly.' Others said 'thanks for the immunity' to avoid first, being falsely accused, and second, guilt by association. They then proceeded to give away precisely nothing. Rothschild was in the latter category. Yet no matter what he did after that, the issue dogged him. He protected himself legally against defamation by threatening to sue anyone who accused him of being the fifth Man. But Rothschild never sued an accuser. Nor did he ever act like an innocent person. Someone with his clout, who was innocent, could have calmly waited for an accusation or innuendo, then pounced. No one, unless it was an intelligence insider with specialist knowledge, could have presented evidence which would have indicted Rothschild. Only a confession was strong enough evidence to convict major spies. The trouble with a court action would be the skeletons it would reveal which would have increased the suspicion that the accused was in fact a Soviet agent. This was the danger that forced him to keep up his legal threats and bluff, but to avoid the courts.

In defending himself, Rothschild instead chose the indirect but effective media route to keep the lid on accusations and deflect them from him. He wrote books and articles, and made highly publicized speeches. These improved his image away from the secret world which preoccupied him for fifty years of his life. He spoke and wrote only rarely and evasively about his links to those in the ring of five. He could hardly dismiss his close friendships with Blunt and Burgess, but he tried to distance himself from them.

He used intelligence, press and publishing contacts to create books which deflected suspicion away from him and on to others, such as the long-suffering ghost of Roger Hollis.

{p. xl} The Third Lord Rothschild was camouflaged as the Fifth Man by virtue of his powerful position in the Establishment. The vast wealth of his banking dynasty embedded him in the power elite more than the other members of the Ring of Five. It was a perfect cover and served to shield him. He seemed the epitome of the ruling class of twentieth-century Britain, and therefore the least likely to be a traitor. Yet a closer scrutiny showed that he had other allegiances, which over time and on specific occasions ran contrary to British interests. Rothschild was more loyal to his Jewish heritage than anything English. He showed this in his long commitment to his race's problems. After his political awakening at Cambridge in 1930 he supported refugees from Soviet and German pogroms. In the war, he feverishly fought the Nazis. Once Hitler was defeated, Rothschild assisted in the creation of a homeland for the Jews who had been dispossessed. When the new nation was established he again helped in guiding Israeli leaders to the people, technology and weaponry which would defend it.

He was never so committed to his country of birth and its established order. In fact, more than once when confronted with a conflict between race and country, he chose race. For instance, when the British tried to thwart the birth of Israel, which would have upset its power base in the Middle East, Rothschild intrigued against British interests. It would not have been difficult for him to make another commitment, this time to another power - the Soviet Union - and what for decades he considered was a superior cause.

As a secret communist and professed socialist he would like to have seen the collapse of the old Establishment order in Britain. There was some irony in Rothschild's secret desire to destroy the House of Lords and capitalism. These sources of power developed his own privilege and prestige, which in turn allowed him to contemplate being in the vanguard of change.

His background again gave him an international view of the world, which paralleled the aspirations of the communist movement. Its emphasis between the wars on science as the vehicle for brave, new Marxist societies appealed to him and many of his colleagues at Cambridge. It was put to him as an experimental phase in the build {p. xli} towards a grand, classless society. Like all experiments there would be failures, but in the end the logic of it would lead to success.

Rothschild's deep involvement in Britain's power structure protected him and may partly explain why he lived longer than anyone else in the Ring of Five. All were under enormous strain while involved in espionage. Burgess, Maclean and Philby were from the upper class but none had the wealth, privilege and prestige of the lord who bestrode politics, business, science and society. Only Blunt, as the monarch's art curator, was guarded in a similar way. But he didn't have the money to buy further protection if required.

This extra protection provided security of mind and it's not surprising that the other four were afflicted by alcoholism in varying degrees. Burgess and Maclean were killed by it. Philby nearly was too, whereas Blunt could not stand pressure without being anaesthetized by gin or Scotch. Rothschild liked his wines and spirits but remained in control.

Another factor not to be ignored in Rothschild's survival was a successful second marriage to his understanding wife, Tess. She admitted in an interview with me that her husband carried too many secrets, and that she was not privy to all of them. (Tess was Rothschild's assistant at MI5 for five years and would have known some secrets within British Intelligence.) While she would not have been aware of his activity involving the KGB, Tess held similar political views to Rothschild and thus provided stability, comfort and communication over issues about which he was passionate. Rothschild was only troubled in his final years, when the pressures brought on by his decades of covering up the past caught up with him and depressed him.

By comparison, Burgess and Blunt were homosexuals in an era when it was illegal, which brought its own pressures. Both philandered most of their lives and had many relationships. Burgess's affairs were unstable and transitory, and it is unlikely that either man could have confided anything of their KGB activity with any partner. Instead, they were forced to bottle up tensions.

According to Modin, Maclean's wife Melinda knew he was a KGB agent (something she has denied), but their marriage was unstable and Maclean was tormented by his bisexuality, especially during times of strain in his double life. Philby only found fulfilment in his fourth marriage to a Russian in Moscow late in life. His brief first {p. xlii} marriage of convenience was to a communist agent in the 1930s, but for the greater proportion of his spying days in the West it is unlikely that his female partners knew of his true masters.

Postscript: Modin published a book of his own on the Cambridge spies in 1994, first in French, Mes Camarades de Cambridge, and then in English, when its title changed to My Five Cambridge Friends. The French edition had Modin playing his game of not divulging the name of The Fifth. But the English edition included some subtle changes which implied Cairncross was number Five. Confused by this, Richard Norton-Taylor of the Guardian newspaper rang Modin in Moscow early in November 1994. He found the Russian angry that the English edition now seemed to be saying Cairncross was the Fifth Man. He categorically stated that he had never said or written this. Daniel Korn, a researcher for the British documentary film company Touch Productions, investigated this contradiction and verified Norton-Taylor's findings. At least Molin remained consistent in his deception about number Five.

Reflections 1994 12 28

On 12th February 1696 William Coe stayed up till past midnight talking of idle and worldly business and moaning about Isaac Archer. Isaac was the 55 year-old minister at Mildenhall who stammered so badly that he had to have somebody to read the lesson for him and whose services usually send William to sleep, though he constantly promised to reform and be more attentive as befitted his position as a leading member of the community. His diary is interspersed with such resolutions as in October 1708 when after he had visited the Cock Inn with Sir Thomas Hanmer, speaker of the House of Commons, and Sir Henry Bunbury where he drank sever-all full glasses of ale and one glass of punch which made him ill and "almost fuddled, worse than I had been for many yeares before. But I repent, oh my God, I repent, I accurse and judge and condemn my self for it"

William's diary contains his religious thoughts on one page and his recognition of "Mercye's recived" on the other. These reveal dramatically the problems associated with travel in the days before the horseless carriage. Entry after entry records accidents as in 1635 ; "My grey horse fell downe with me coming from Royston, and I gott no hurt" (12th June), "He fell downe againe with me and did fling me over his head, and I gott no hurt" (July 2nd), "He fell downe againe with me and I escaped any hurt, I thank God" (July 3rd). Other members of the family also experienced problems with animals - in April 1705 "My great bitch Surly flew upon my daughter Sarah and bitt a hole under her right eye, but I thank God she had no further mischief" and in October 1706 "My wife went to Milden in the coach and as she came home the horses were frighted att a flock of sheep that came running by them, that they began to run away, and my wife jumpt out of the coach ... got a fall and hurt her breast, and gott a great cold with comeing home on foot in the evening and was very much out of order for 3 or 4 days , , ,"

Parson Isaac Archer also experienced the pairs of seeing his children suffer - of the nine that were born between 1670 and 1682 eight died including William (aged 3), Isaac (1), Frances (4 months), Anonymus "borne August 7th 675. died August 25 1675" and Anonyma "borne August 21 1681, Buried same day, Sunday", His diary records the graphic details "My wife was ill, and we thought she would have miscarried, but did not ... next morning about 4 of clock was delivered of a girle; after 3 houres sharpe paines, she came wrong, and was wasted; it lived halfe an hours and died, I buried it at Frecknam by Isaac, in hopes of resurrection!"

Isaac had attended Trinity college, survived an attack of smallpox in December 1657 which he had caught "from a girle who had newly had them" in Petty Cury and became a Minister of the Established Church, although his family were nonconformists and his father strongly opposed to his actions. Ha was appointed to Arrington - "good but ignorant people" but stayed only a short time before transferring to Chippenham in 1662 where he began an long and often troubled relationship with the parish and its manorial lords which lasted for over 25 years, but with a period at wickers based at Spinney Abbey where he caused local gossip over his friendship with a handsome widow. In 1667 he moved to Barton Mills where he married the daughter of the minister of Isleham church and finally to Mildenhall where, as William Coe notes "Mr Archer dyed April 24, 1700"

THE WILBRAHAMS have just produced a little booklet which, by using old and new photographs, brings the past into the present.

There are the cosy cottages with their attractive gardens, often seeming much as they stand today. Only a few decades ago they were as cosy as in these days of central heating, because of the number of bodies crammed into the dwellings which provided large families with a roof over their heads — cottages which now seem scarcely big enough, even when knocked together, for all the paraphernalia of modern life for two or three people.

If they lacked modern amenities such as toilets (mains sewerage did not come till 1973) or piped water (1939 in Little Wilbraham), many had their own source of drinking water in a soft-water butt by the back door which collected rain and numerous wriggling bugs, the bigger of which could be fished out before drinking.

In many cases, however, the rain which fell on the thatch went through it and into the rooms beneath, adding to the misery of those living there. A well in the garden would have saved the trek to the village's public pump, with all the hard work that filling a bucket demanded — it would not be quite so bad if the pump did not go stiff and need every ounce of effort to obtain the important last drop.

Being public, there would be less likelihood of contamination from domestic privy or outpourings from the pigsty, which often overflowed into the hole in the ground which passed for a well in some places. And it would be the parish council's problem when the well went dry — just one of the changing responsibilities that are charted in Desmond Hawkins's introduction.

Fetching water involved work and wait, but would be enlivened by the gossip and latest news exchanged - stories that might not find their way into the newspapers.

Yet a surprising amount of information did find its way on to their pages, as Linton Historical Society has just shown with the publication of extracts from the Cambridge Chronicle between 1775 and 1858, transcribed from the indexes in the Cambridgeshire Collection by Ruth Newbery.

Illness was something to be dreaded, and when in November 1845 a passing tramp brought smallpox into Linton people were urged to stay away from any sufferer — "it might appear cruel, but when the health and lives of the community are thereby endangered, the feelings of a few individuals ought not to be so minutely considered".

A few years earlier an old lady had endowed a "Post House" which was intended as a hospital for infectious patients but now this was being rented out to provide homes for a number of village poor women. They ought to be turned out and the building used for its original purpose, the reporter opined.

Fortunately, within a month the disease began to subside and there were no fatalities, though neighbouring villages had been less fortunate.

The book records a wealth of social history, including riots and fire, omnibus accidents and gossip in 1845 of the impending arrival of the railway, though it was to be 20 more years before it came to pass — a story that will hopefully be carried in a second volume.

The Wilbrahams 1894-1994, published by Dr T D Hawkins, Greyfriars, Little Wilbraham, £4.50. Linton as described in newspaper extracts, by Ruth Newbery, published by Linton and District Historical Society.

Francis Frith was born of a Quaker family in Chesterfield in 1822 and established a wholesale grocery business in Liverpool. By the time he was 34 he had sold it for a considerable fortune and was able to indulge his early passion for exploration and the new art of photography. In 1860 Francis married Mary Ann Rosling whose brother was a talented amateur photographer and established a photographic company in Reigate, Surrey. He then set himself the daunting task of photographing every city, town and village in the British Isles, He took with him his wife, two servants, four photographic assistants and a growing number of children - six of them eventually

The task was not one to be rushed for Frith saw himself as a chronicler of his time, an artist using the new medium of photography in the same way that other artists had used brushes and canvas. For the first few years he took all the pictures himself but later recruited a select group of artist-photographers to assist him, By the time of his death in 1898 some 40,000 views had been taken including a series of Cambridge college scenes dated 1890., with views of Ely 1891, St Neots 1897 & Huntingdon 1898.

His earliest, connection with Cambridge seems to be photographs, "printed by F, Frith" which are included in C,H, Cooper's "Memorials of Cambridge", first issued in 1858.

Francis Frith's business was continued by his sons after his death in 1898 and soon the company had become the biggest of its kind in the world with photographs purchased as souvenirs by visitors. When in 1900 the Post Office allowed postcards to be sent through the Royal Mail the increase was dramatic, A network of photographers were recruited and briefed on the Company's requirements for scenic views, street scenes and architectural subjects. By 1914 there were 52,000 pictures in the company's files, 20,000 more had been acquired by 1939 with another 200,000 during the 1940s, 50s & 60s.

Cambridge itself had been visited nine times by 1933 but sadly the majority of the cards published were college scenes lacking the detail of contemporary life that Francis himself sought to capture. When the company closed in 1970 the library of old prints and negatives were sold and the Cambridgeshire County Record Office took the opportunity of buying the earlier views of Cambridge and its county. Others remained with Frith and various initiatives have over the last 20 years been introduced in order to make them available to researchers, Now the remainder of the county collection (except for those college views) have been purchased by Cambridgeshire Libraries and Heritage Service and over 2,500 pictures will shortly be deposited in Huntingdon Record Office, Peterborough and Wisbech Libraries and the Cambridgeshire Collection.

The majority were taken in the 1950s and 1960s but many never issued as postcards, They show villages from Abbots Ripton to Wisbech St Mary including old thatched cottages and new housing estates such as Hales Close in Melbourn (why on earth should anybody produce a postcard of a housing estate!) - and yet how different to see the streets unlined by parked cars, Other topics include the Airmen's married quarters at Waterbeach, Willingham and the two Swaffham Prior windmills, the Bell Inn Bottisham and the Post Office at Fulbourn. More striking images include Grantchester with horses being led through the village in 1929 and the Green Man with a natty sports car parked neatly on the green in front, whilst on the Green at Histon a venerable old tree appears about to topple in to the water.

All in all it represents a considerable addition to the Collection's more recent photographs and will keep us busy cataloguing for some time

ALTHOUGH most readers visiting the Cambridgeshire Collection still consult the traditional material — books, newspapers, cuttings, maps or pictures — there is a small but increasing trend to other sources, such as tapes.

These include original recordings of people talking about their life and times — or in the case of the late Percy North recalling the street cries that used to echo through the area of Newmarket Road, Cambridge as watercress, rag-and-bone or fishmen advertised their wares. Then there are recordings of local musicians, such as the just-released sounds of some nine Cambridge church and chapel organs, which will be filed alongside renditions by the Toby Jug and Washboard Band from some years ago and the "Ways to Move" compilation of music by local groups.

The Ways to Move title has also been applied to a video, produced by Jay Taylor, which details the background of The Junction in Cherry Hinton Road. Interviews and television news features are intercut with music and specially-filmed Cambridge sequences.

Other local organisations have turned to video to promote or describe their work.

The St Columba Group therapy centre helps people who are anxious, guilty, confused or lonely. Groups meet regularly to explore their feelings or, through psychodrama, their past, present and future experiences.

All this is detailed in a short video just issued by the centre, a copy of which has been lodged in the Collection. The story of Waterbeach from the earliest times to the present day — from forest to fen to field to factory — has been told by Denis Cheason on a one-hour video. It traces the history of the Car Dyke (a Roman canal from the Cam to Lincoln), the draining of the Fens, the older village houses and the story of John Denson, a local farmer who published a commentary on the condition of the labourers in the 19th century which has become a most important record of their times and hardship.

The video tells of the impact of the two world wars, shows services in the Salvation Army citadel and local chapels, and joins the primary schoolchildren in their classrooms. With a combination of modern video film, original paintings and old photographs it provides a model which other villagers might well emulate.

Les Price of Fowlmere is one who has been producing such films for some time, and they have been much appreciated in his community. He has also assisted us in copying some of our material on to video, including the Burwell photographs of Dorothy Grainger.

One of his current projects has been to produce a video based on my book Images of Cambridge. The first section to be filmed covers the period from the 1960s and includes topics the Lion Yard and Kite area redevelopment, Elizabeth Bridge and other traffic changes and the scenes and fashions of the last 30 years.

Some videos have been supplied to old people's homes and hospitals so that the residents may have something to watch on their TV screens that might jog memories or encourage conversation, and we should be pleased to hear from other institutions who might be interested in acquiring one.

The organs of Cambridge, issued on two cassettes or CDs by OxRecs.

The work of the St Columba Group therapy centre, from 3 Downing Place, Cambridge. The story of Waterbeach, available from Denis Cheason, 4 Primrose Lane;

John Heathcote would sit in his castle near Peterborough and tell how one guest had left from the dining room window and paddled away in a boat to shoot coot in the fen, An unremarkable occurrence except that Connington castle did not actually have a moat!

Like the fenland around it did have a drainage problem and drainage windmills were an essential part of the local scene though by the time Heathcote sketched them they were generally falling into decay, having been superseded by steam machines that could operate even when the wind ceased to blow. But in 1826 the great Whittlesey mere disappeared, The season was dry and large cracks formed on the exposed bed, then 'when about one hundred acres of water remained a great hurricane of wind came and blew most of it into the cracks and fissures and it disappeared', Every fish perished, laying like heaps of snow on the shore, Fortunately for sportsmen the water returned in the winter.

It was to be a brief respite for in 1850 a giant pump, newly exhibited at the Crystal palace, was set to work pumping over 100 tons of water a minute from the mere to the river and as levels sank tons of fish were taken out, amongst them pike as big as 20lb. Eventually there was just one acre of water left covered with fish 1½ feet deep. The bream, roach and chub were not considered worth the trouble of removing and although a few were buried , thousands rotted on the surface. People flocked from miles around to take advantage of the vast numbers of eels. Walking over the soft mud with flat boards attached to their shoes, Then two years later the river banks gave way and the Mere again went under water until the engineers could perform their work once more.

Other parts of the area offered superb shooting, Heathcote and his friends usually started at seven, breaking through the thin ice of a November morning, jumping ditches with the aid of a pole - sometimes placing a piece of turf in the middle of the widest ones to make the leap more easy - and then bagging anything from six to fifteen couples of snipe in a day. When winter came it gave the fenman increased mobility for as the waterways froze they allowed skaters to travel more quickly, covering a mile in just under four minutes and allowing long journeys to be accomplished in a single day. Skating matches and competitions could be arranged for prizes of tea or meat, with spectators' needs catered for by a old woman roasting chestnuts in a Dutch oven on the ice whilst alongside a small oblong box on bones, drawn by two dogs, contained gin for those who were thirsty.

John Moyer Heathcote knew the area well and served it as High Sheriff, Guardian of the Poor and Member of Parliament. His obituary described him as "a model country gentleman of the old school, genial, amiable and cheerful". In 1876 he published his 'Reminiscences of fen and mere' which has been out of print for over 100 years but is now reissued with a new introduction by Edward Storey, Although no classic of literature it is a must for every fenman's library not least for Heathcote's sketches which capture the days when the fen landscape was radically different from the fertile acres seen today.

"THERE are at least two Cambridges. One the visitors do not see and the other that residents can only glimpse." On successive nights I was welcomed in both and in between we received a unique record of each.

Barnwell and Fen Ditton Local History Society meets in a community centre at the far end of Newmarket Road. Together we considered something of the changes in that area of Cambridge over the last 100 years and over coffee and cake heard of much more that had never been set down.

Such as how the gardener who tended the flowers and bushes at the former Pye headquarters, just across the road from the venue, was dismissed when he was spotted parking his car there - it was a Jaguar, which overshadowed the humbler transport of his employer. What modes of transport brought together the members of the second group I can only speculate - probably the bicycle or Shanks's pony!

One gets used to talking about the Cambridgeshire Collection as part of a programme covering water supply, Fen floods or country bygones, but not usually following such luminaries as the Rouge Dragon Pursuivant or preceding the Garter Principal King of Arms.

It was probably the first time anybody had spoken about the work of the public library service to a meeting of Cambridge University Heraldic and Genealogical Society (although of course the Central Library in Lion Yard serves everybody - "MA and mechanic, the undergraduate and the schoolboy, old men in broad cloth and young boys in fustian", as our first librarian, John Pink wrote nearly a century ago).

One thing that unites the Backs and Barnwell is the river that runs past both, and one person who knows that river well is Prof Neville Willmer, Fellow of Clare and Emeritus Professor of Histology. In 1979 he published a sketchbook surveying the Cam from the springs at Ashwell to its junction with the Old West. The Collection was acknowledged in the preface and he has now deposited two albums of his original sketches, including views of the famous and beautiful stone bridge at Clare and the less beautiful gasworks at Stourbridge Common. They complement the similar views produced nearly 100 years earlier by Robert Farren and will be appreciated both now and in the future.

Another connection between the two Cambridges was discussed in a pamphlet issued in 1818, of which the third edition was catalogued just yesterday. It tells of the awful death of Lawrence Dundas, an undergraduate of Trinity College, who had sought the fabled warm and companionable welcome formerly traditionally associated with Barnwell (or at least with certain of the young ladies who made their homes there).

Poor rich Lawrence had dined with companions at a house in Bridge Street and remained drinking till near 11, when he set off with a friend to visit the prostitutes in the red-light district just across Parker's Piece. However, he was so drunk he could not get his gown on and then lost his way and tumbled into a muddy ditch, not much above knee-deep, out of which he struggled once or twice. But then, having stripped off everything but his pantaloons and stockings, he fell to rise no more, being found dead from exposure next day.

The Vicar of Chesterton published an address on the evils of drunkenness and fornication, laying some of the blame on the Fitzwilliam Museum for allowing unrestricted access to its pictures of naked ladies -and urging colleges to control the wine and dinner parties which form part of the tradition of hospitality that I was privileged to share with members of the University Heraldic Society

Anne Cock felt herself most badly treated, The 60-year old widow had done little enough in her eyes - she had only entered the chapel at Sidney Sussex college in the middle of a service and told then what she thought - that their praises and services were not acceptable to the Lord, but they were an abomination to Him. John Hudson, a glovemaker, had hauled her out, kicked her across the courtyard and banged her against the college gate in the process. Then on her way home one of Hudson's daughters had thrown water over her head and Edmond Salter, a tailor, "did throw a piss-pot of urine upon her".

It was 1653 just 15 years since Cromwell's men had purged the University of those with Royalist sympathies, destroyed college altars and statues and enforced the Solemn League and Covenant against popery. But now the monarchy was soon to be reinstated, the clergy reappointed, and soon an Act of Uniformity compelling dons to conform to Anglican liturgy.

Anne was one of the group of people known as Quakers, refusing to take oaths or pay tithes and with strong adherence to pacifism. In Cambridge they were considered fair game by undergraduate priests. Another old lady, of their number was stopped by the rude multitude of scholars thrown on the ground, kicked and stoned and abused shamefully, Others could testify that they had been thrown into the river with the students mocking that they had baptised them.

Nor was it just the women who were targeted: John Peace was attacked by-snowballs "& one snow-ball hit him on the. eye, so as he thought it had dropt out into his hand ,,, and he was mocked, and scoffed, and abused, and kicked by the Schollars, and they thrust pinns into his leggs",

The Quakers hired a room in which they could meet but students threw stones and dirt against the windows, "and they shott bullets into the Chambers at us, and flung great stones".

Becoming even bolder they invaded the meeting room itself hollowing and hissing and calling for beer. They pulled off the Quaker's hats, took hold of them by the nose and when this failed to break up the meeting threw apple cores and tobacco-pipes, closed the blinds and put out the lights "and piss'd in the Entry among the People, and daub'd the lock of the Door and key with Dung, so that we could not tell how to touch it..."

The Quakers appealed for assistance to the Mayor but to no avail, they informed the University Proctors who refused to help. Student abuse grew - they lifted up the women's dresses as they walked in the street, made them stand in a cesspit whilst they tore the coats off their backs and kissed them during the Meetings. Eventually Thomas Nicholson, a former Mayor, took up their cause. He attended the meetings along with half a dozen Constables, standing on a form to observe all that was going on, and ensuring peace for a while.

In 1659 Edward Sammon published a pamphlet entitled "A discovery of the education of the schollars of Cambridge" describing the "unchristian breeding and the horrible Fruits of the University-Men; And how that Spirit of the Whore and false Prophet, and the remainder of the Dreggs of Popery boyles up in them, in Persecution, and Madness, and Ignorance", It was intended for sober people to read and consider but has been forgotten for over three hundred years. Now a copy has been discovered in the library of the Friends Meeting House in London and reprinted in a limited edition to give some insight into the sufferings and persecutions of the people called Quakers,

Two remarkable first-hand records of war have recently been received, both recorded by women.

Miss Dorothy Nicholls was the daughter of the Fulbourn doctor who decided to follow her father's profession. She became a State Registered Nurse and a qualified midwife before joining the Red Cross in 1914 to nurse wounded soldiers. She tended troops in converted sugar sheds at Boulogne docks and comforted Belgian civilians suffering from typhoid fever before volunteering to nurse in Russia, She journeyed via Archangel arriving by boat just before the sea iced over and amongst her adventures converted a palace into a hospital and went to the Russian front with a field hospital. In November 1916 she was making an horrendous train journey to a place she described as the back of beyond, standing in mud up to her waist and living in a log hut sunk half below the level of the ground. Her party of nurses had left Kiev by car through snow and severe frost to join a train packed to capacity.

After days of travel they reached a place called Czernovitz where the roads were deep in mud, the hills terrible and with still another 50 miles to go, Eventually they reached Selatin where they slept overnight-on stretchers in an empty room before resuming their trek along mountain roads, having to abandon one of their carts stuck in mud before finally arriving at their hospital deep in a forest at midnight. It was here that she was to earn the St George Medal, given at that time to troops in the firing line, before being forced to leave the country following the Russian revolution of 1917. By April that year she was home in Fulbourn. Dorothy's exploits were recorded in letters sent home one of which was published in the Cambridge Chronicle at the time, and by a series of snapshots which we have now been allowed to copy, a testimony to a remarkable woman who died in 1980

Peggy Watts tells nothing of her own wartime exploits while she was in the Wrens in 1944 but the letters sent to her by her mother provide a unique record of everyday life in a Cambridgeshire village during the Second World War. With all the extra troops based around Quy - with another 1000. airmen arriving by train at Lode station on 28th May alone - the pubs soon sold out their allocation of beer, although locals could go around the back door for a pint. Rationing was tight but often there was nothing to spend the coupons on - no dried fruit or biscuits to be had anywhere in May. There were particular problems over replacing worn-out Wellingtons. The old ones had to be taken to a shop to be condemned, a form to that effect sent to the War Agriculture Office who sent a permit back. The permit had to be taken back to the shop who would order the Wellingtons with another visit to Cambridge to collect them when they finally arrived.

Bombing raids were an occupational nuisance. On 3rd April one farmer found a crater in his field but nobody knew how it got there as there had been no raids recently. 16 days later it was still there as nobody could decide whether it had exploded or not. On 1st May two men came to examine it, pronounced it live and promised to send the bomb disposal men, When they arrived next day they discovered it was an RAF 500lb bomb, so they left it to the RAF.

The RAF could only think it had been intended to be dropped over France but had got caught up somehow and only fell off when the plane was nearly back to the base. Next day it exploded cracking window panes in nearby houses.

But the book is also full of everyday problems - as when Billy got scarlet fever. The doctor allowed him to be kept at home if he was shut in the front room, but Betty had to go through the room to get upstairs to bed. The only solution was for a ladder to be put up from the street to her window, causing considerable comment, not least amongst visiting troops

JANUARY was, I was told, a quiet month in the Collection, enquiries had dropped to just over 1,200, some 200 down on the previous year.

Doubtless many of those who visited us for information had gone away frustrated either because we did not hold or could not find what they sought or that there was so much material they did not have time to consult it all. People come and go and whatever they do with whatever they find is often a mystery. Occasionally we may learn the result, accepting that it is the successes we are told about never the failures.

Thus one lad came in to say that the project he had undertaken was marked in three sections. In the first he had obtained 30 out of 30, in the second 20 out of 20 and in the third 30 out of 30. Then we had a letter which read: "Last summer I had the most enjoyable and rewarding experience of pursuing a research project in your library ... the facilities are so comprehensive and the time and space so conducive to research, that I feel my high grade for this work is largely due to you".

This had been an inter-disciplinary study of infant mortality in Cambridge 1876-1913 produced for an Open University course which concluded that the food available to the majority of women was deficient of essential nutrients for the welfare of the unborn baby and developing infants and that defective sewers allied to waterlogged soils had caused whole areas of the town to become saturated with sewage leading to diarrhoeal diseases which killed many young babies. Amongst sources consulted were the medical officer of health reports, Eglantyne Jebb's study of Cambridge social issues published 1906 together with articles indexed in the local newspapers and other unpublished dissertations.

At the end of the study Margaret Craig indicates ways in which the information might be reformatted to provide a basis for GCSE work and develop into other research projects.

By coincidence earlier that week we had received a visit from a Professor of the Open University concerned that work produced for such dissertations should be made available to other researchers. Students are encouraged to deposit copies but they were also investigating the practicalities of producing them on compact discs. Would libraries have the technology to access them?

I had just unpacked a new Acorn computer acquired not only to provide us with a compact disc drive but also to enable us to link in with work being undertaken by local schools. A fine example of this is a package on The Battle of the Somme produced by Netherhall School which features diaries and reminiscences, maps, pictures and even songs which together with worksheets and project notes provide students with a wide range of materials.

Our new machine might perhaps one day allow us to produce our own discs so that these can be supplied to schools and colleges to enable their students to search, identify and retrieve information — such as that on infant mortality — without needing to visit the Library.

This in turn may reduce our enquiry rate still further and give precious moments more for acquiring, evaluating and cataloguing new items.

The big snag however is that whilst our users might be computer-literate our staff are not and we too experience the frustrations of finding the way around an unfamiliar system that afflicts many of those who visit the Collection.

Reflections 1995 03 01

AFTER some 30 years of travelling the A10 to Cambridge I have finally found a way to speed the journey. It still takes a long as ever but, now, I almost hope that the lights do turn red before I get to them. The magic ingredient is the talking book from the Lending Library playing on the car cassette.

Having borrowed Cyril Fletcher's account of establishing his pantomimes in Cambridge, I am now discovering something of country life around 1812 as recorded by Mary Mitford in Our Village, though the view as seen by a correspondent to The Lady's Magazine scarcely reflects the harsh realities of the time.

Few Cambridgeshire items are yet available on cassette and of these pride of place must go to Tiger Talk, a compilation of ordinary people talking about everyday things like Docky time, a break for "a great lump of fat pork perched on top of half a loaf of bread. "In the loaf of bread you used to make a little hole — we all did it. You put the butter in it, to keep the butter so it didn't run everywhere." The name reflected the time when farmers were hard on their employees. When they ate their food they would be docked that amount of time from their labours.

When the March winds blew the soil did too. "It gets all in your clothes, in your trousers and every-where... You couldn't see five yards. The people would have to go home. You couldn't work in them conditions. The winds come whipping across there and the little bits of clumps are whipped over and over and over and they just cut our beets off at the roots and by three, half past three, four o'clock in the afternoon we go home with our heads hanging down knowing full well that our total sugar beet crop has been absolutely destroyed by the wind and there is nothing else we can do but re-drill again."

We are told that birds were caught with a net on two old bamboo poles and then there was rat catching. "We used to go around the stacks and we used to get over a hundred rats out one one stack." Then there were the sick-ness benefits, the pub - wooden seats, little sawdust spittoons and everybody with their own seat, just like at church. And, of course, country cures. "If a child had the whooping cough you caught a mouse and fried it and made it eat the mouse. Roast onions were a cure for ear ache, a cut-throat razor for your corns.

Even the Christmas Tiger Talk tales on Side Two can be enjoyed at any time, recalling games such as "Tipit", one of my grand-father's favourites, in which people would pass a coin from hand to hand under the table. Then all put their fists on top and somebody had to guess in which hand the coin was hidden, eliminating them one by one until finally ordering somebody to "Tip-it." The cassette has been out for some time but within the last we we have received copies of a transcript. This enables the information contained to be more easily located, but cannot match the voices of real people talking about their life and times just to you whether in the car, in the kitchen or snuggled down in bed.

A more recent production is The Fen Blows by Justin Bernasconi. A collection of original songs based on Fenland history, the title track reflects the Littleport Riots of 1816 whilst the cover picture depicts the Warboys witches, hanged 1593 for the death of Lady Cromwell. Fen drainage is reflected in "Paupers Cut" telling how in 1832 the Wisbech poor were employed to dig a new dike to benefit rich farmers and in "Bishop's Fork" recounting how in the 1400s Bishop Morton devised a scheme for a taxing both rich and poor to finance his drainage work. The words of the songs are published with the cassette, though they should not be read while driving!

Recently I gave a talk to members of the St Ives Civic Society when some 56 people turned up to hear a presentation on "Images of Cambridge", but settled instead for "Dickensian Cambridge" with its investigation of the splendour and poverty, characters and scandals that characterised that period. The Society then went on to plan an excursion to one of the greatest houses in the Land, Buckingham Palace, with its magnificent staircases, grand rooms and treasures.

"Buggingham Palace" by contrast had no such attractions to welcome visitors when it stood in Church Lane, Trumpington. It comprised an old tumbled-down cottage, occupied by Mother Sivill who was supposed to be a witch and fortune teller who prayed on superstitious people, One evening two men were passing by when one said to the other "I wonder if the old B---- is at home", "Yes the old B, is at home, Come in", But the men went along the Lane in record time.

To old Mother Sivill belongs the credit of being the last person to be placed in the pillory at Cambridge which stood near the old Market Cross which was near the end of St Mary's Passage. "Mother" was placed in the pillory for one hour, turned round every 15 minutes and pelted with eggs as a warning for future fortune tellers. For a piece of silver she guaranteed to give your enemy trouble by causing his chickens to have croup, his cattle the glanders, his pigs the fever and his wife the creeping palsy or any other trouble.

This frightful character was just one of the people featured by schoolmaster P.R. Robinson when he lectured in Trumpington Village Hall some 70 years ago, drawing on his own extensive knowledge and on the wealth of village anecdotes that had been passed down to him. He told of the Gibbet where Miss Bertha Moore's great grandmother could recollect seeing a man hanging, tarred and feathered some time around 1760, though there was still a gibbet to be viewed, as he showed in a slide depicting weasels, stoats, hawks, jays and magpies caught by the local gamekeeper and displayed for public view.

Less drastic punishments were meted out at the village stocks or whipping post whilst those villains confined to the lock-up were provided with a seat but kept in position by being chained in irons. This stood beside the pound where straying cattle were placed and not far from the smithy whose blacksmith made a bicycle on which he won almost the first big cycle race which was held between Trumpington mile stone and the stone bridge.

Then there was "Squandermania", the coprolite works started on 2nd January 1318 when millions of pounds were spent to extract the phosphoratic nodules for use in making high explosives for the war. It is said that one complete train load was mined and send to Norwich, only to be returned and emptied back into the pit. The works provided a source of high-waged income with one butcher boy throwing in his job delivering meat for 9/- (45p) a week to become an engine cleaner at £2.12,6 (£2.60) before ending up earning £7 a week as a fitter.

However the imported Irish labourers were always grumbling and went on strike! All this was imparted to a packed audience with the aid of lantern slides. These slides still exist, as do the notes which Robinson used for his lecture, and we have been given the opportunity of copying them for addition to the Collection. However now I understand there are plans to repeat the lecture, which if they come to pass will guarantee an even more fascinating evening that that enjoyed 70 years ago

A 150 year old mystery has now been solved thanks to the columns of the local newspaper. Although the story of University and college rowing is well documented the origins of town rowing have been unknown. In 1931 Briscoe Snelson contributed a series of articles to the "Cambridge Chronicle" which traced the history back to 1868 when ten town crews, including the Albert Institute, Young Mens Christian Association, two boats from the United College Servants and three representing the Cambridge Town Rowing Club competed in eight-oar bumping races.

But new research by J.R. Moy takes the story back many more years to a newspaper article appearing on 2nd September 1843 announcing an eight-oar cutter match between the Cambridge Town Boat Club and the Vulture Club between Baitsbite lock and the Pike and Eel, Chesterton - nearly double the distance rowed in the University races, There was to be another difference for instead of being a bumping race the boats would compete over an equal distance. It was about six o'clock when the start took place and soon it was apparent that the Town were gaining on their opponents and by the time the finishing post was reached the distance between the boats had narrowed from one hundred yards to thirty. The newcomers saluted a famous victory for this was their first season whilst their rivals had been operating for four years previous.

In May 1844 the first Town and University match took place with Caius College, who had been Head of the River, competing against a crew whose members included H, Newberry, B. Diver, H.S. Foster with A, Logan as their Captain and F, Logan as stroke. The Town's chances were improved by a new eight-oar boat, of extraordinary lightness and peculiar construction which had been build for them by Logan. The course between Baitsbite and Chesterton, about a mile and a half, was thronged with spectators until there was one dense line of human beings from Midsummer Common to Chesterton, whilst hundreds of men chose to run along the haling way to follow the boats up to the start.

Had misfortune not struck the Town crew, with the second oar breaking his foot-strap, the race might have been closer, but it was soon apparent that the University boat was gaining at every stroke. By the time the winning post was reached the gap of 100 yards which had separated the crews at the start had been reduced to just 25, and - so the reporter claims - had the Caius men not eased up they would even have bumped their opponents.

By now there were more teams - Endeavour, Eagle, Arethusa, Minerva and Albion and leaving aside the sport there was entertainment with a band to add to the attractions of a walk beside the river, made even more pleasant by the large number of young ladies who were present. Less welcome were the lines of barges one of which brushed a spectator's boat allowing the gentlemen an opportunity of having a bath without the trouble of undressing. Floating weeds caught on the oars and the terrible stench of various areas of the river in 1868 quite spoilt the enjoyment for both rowers and the immense crowds of fashionable onlookers who thronged the banks, prompting plans in 1869 for additional amusements such as swimming races.

The battles and squabbles, achievements and frustrations of the years between 1843 and 1868 are documented fully with summaries of other stories up to the end of the century in a publication whose 250 pages will make fascinating reading even for people who have never climbed into a racing boat, and add a new insight into Victorian life and sport.

SWAFFHAM Prior has two of various things — two churches, two wind-mills and now two films.

The second was premiered recently and concentrated on the windmills, both now in full sail, though only one actually grinding. The film-maker, Ron Prime, using skills devel-oped as a professional sound recordist, was also responsible for the previous production which followed the restoration of the church bells, and incidentally traced the story of the churches and churchyard.

Film-making, even on an amateur level, is an expensive hobby and Ron received funding from the David Urwin arts award, which has itself recently been the subject of a video. The award commemorates the life and achievements of the former Cambridge city planning officer who died in 1988 and whose own musical and artistic skills is reflected in the film, together with performances from the musicians and others whose talents have been enhanced by a grant from the trust.

Together his friends and admirers in the villages around Bottisham have contributed to a scheme which has benefited several remarkable people in the six years it has been operating. The video will bring benefits to a wider audience. I was not present for Ron's film since I was sharing with members of March Museum Society something of the story of the 1947 floods. Wandering around their admirable and interesting collections I spotted on their bookstall a video devoted to the town's railway heritage which features archive film and personal memories to recount something of the story of the town.

The name Whitemoor evoked memories of what was once the largest railway marshalling yard in Europe and, through which in wartime, travelled the trains which carried freight and munitions to serve the war effort. When in 1944 an ammunition train exploded in Soham station it was the heroism and professionalism of March railwaymen which ensured the devastation was not far greater.

The medals earned that night by Ben Gimbert and James Nightall form part of the display in the museum and the story is commemorated on the video. Many of the lines that made March a significant railway town have now disappeared but the route to Wimblington, Chatteris, St Ives and all stations to Cambridge is featured on Rails to Cambridge.

Modern film of forgotten crossing gates and derelict stations is intermixed by amateur film footage and reminiscences by former employees. It includes two sequences of the route from Cambridge to St Ives which make interesting viewing for those proposing the reopening of that line and emphasises the enormity of the restoration work that would be required. There is even footage of the Milton Road crossing which now carries much more road traffic than when the line was in its heyday — and even that was sufficient in the 1930s for the construction of an underpass to keep vehicles moving while the gates were closed. The debate over the proposed reopening has ground on for years, doubtless even adding to the paper that used to pass over the desk of David Urwin, City Planning Officer.

If March was the railway capital of the Isle, then Ely cathedral is its spiritual centrepiece. Now the daily life and activities of this most complex organisation have been explored by a young pupil from Witchford Village College whose questioning of the Dean, the clock-winder, choristers and Bishop have been captured on a video which, with teachers' notes and worksheets, give primary school children — and the rest of us — some insight into the history and work of the Ship of the Fens.

"Never-to-be-forgotten years" is the phrase one ex-soldier uses to describe his experiences of wartime including two memories of Venice - one of a steam ship of that name boarded on a

Scottish loch at the start of his adventures, the other a Gondola ride along the famous canals a world away from the fenlands of Cambridgeshire. The place has less happy memories for the Clark family for their only son, Richard, having survived the war, was killed in a flying accident over that city just a week after hospitalities had ceased.

Others recollect unexpected meetings with village lads - Tommy Parish finding himself sharing a ferry boat across the river Ganges with Bert Sadler, having time for just a brief word with Ted Lock somewhere in Burma and meeting Frank Nicholls in India. He was too busy repairing aircraft to notice Billy Hobbs, the only survivor from the Stretham men who had been present at the fall of Singapore, his fate unknown to his family until January 1945.

Others got news such as the brief card from Tom Pearson which merely said "I am a Prisoner of War, I am well; I hope you are the same, All my love". It had been written on 20th June 1942 and took a year and a month to arrive. The family waited and waited for other news; finally in April 1946 came official confirmation that his grave was being maintained at Government expense and a less formal letter from Padre Noel Duckworth enclosing Tom's signet ring, proof to his mother that her son had one friend at the time of his death. The families of Albert Driver, Douglas Gibbs. John Howe, Alec Thompson and John Wesley experienced similar heartbreak,

Those left at home had all the problems of maintaining some semblance of village life. Cupboards which had been well-stocked at the beginning of the war were soon empty, though Bert Parish still supplied some fresh milk to supplement the dried version coming from America. The numbers to be fed increased with the arrival of 146 Jewish evacuees necessitating considerable improvisation, and not a little coercion. Schooling arrangements were one thing, the continuation of their Jewish faith another and although they might attend the Church Sunday Schools if their foster parents chose, every Saturday morning the school became the village Synagogue. One evacuee child was Leslie who remembers going to the recreation ground and "for the first time in my life, I stood on grass!" He recalls also the concerts and Empire Day parades and especially the people who fostered him - in fact he remained long after the war and became so much of the family he eventually took their surname.

Thomas came to the village less willingly as one of a batch of Romanian prisoners of war. They arrived in Stretham in 1947 and were based in a house which had the luxury of a bathroom but through whose roof snow drifted. They worked on the farms with brightly-coloured patches on their khaki-brown uniforms and to supplement their sugar supply boiled beet to make black treacle. They earned a little extra money by making slippers from the sacks in which corn was stored and found the locals friendly. Thomas married an English girl and has settled in the village.

Their personal stories have now been shared with the woman who, during the war, reported the news for the weekly newspaper, who taught in the school, organised the evacuees, rejoiced with the good news and gave sympathetic support to the bereaved. Since she started her book several of the men and women mentioned have passed away - including the village's hero. Bill Goad, who modestly omitted reference to his Albert Medal when asked for his experiences - an oversight remedied by Beatrice Stevens in her record of Stretham's wartime memories.

BOOKS of local war-time reminiscences are appearing thick and fast with VE Day celebrations coming up.

At Little Thetford Bob Young, of Horseshoes, has spent time and considerable effort in researching that hamlet during the earlier conflict, 1914-1918, the result of which are published at £1.50. The interest was sparked when, during church services, he allowed his mind and eyes to wander to the war memorial, prompting him to speculate on the sacrifice that had been made.

Ten men who had fallen — nearly five per cent of the population — were named, but he discovered two others recorded on the memorial in the cemetery and another in Ely Cathedral. Who were they and what had happened to them?

One had fallen on 1st July 1916 at the Battle of the Somme, along with 21,391 others, and is buried in Serre Road cemetery near Calais. Others fell at Arras and Mons. Some died within months of joining up, others within weeks of the Armistice.

Seven of the Dewsberry family enlisted, four of them brothers, three were killed, another was awarded the Distinguished Conduct Medal for firing his Lewis gun for 48 hours under continuous and heavy shell fire. He survived the war despite being gassed and wounded no less than four times.

But despite all the research, mystery surrounds the background of Clement Driver who, for the moment, remains just a name on a memorial.

If it is difficult researching one village, what about a whole battalion?

The three Huntingdonshire Cyclist Battalions were initially recruited between 1914 and 1919 from within the old county, though they later drew people from a wider area.

Martyn Smith has compiled an index of over 2,000 of these "Gaspipe Cavalry" many of whom subsequently transferred to other units so they could go on active service. Page after page of names and numbers, enlistment and service details are recorded.

Among them all is G.F. Dewberry from Woodwalton who enlisted in May 1915, his subsequent fate undocumented. The monumental work continues and Martyn, who would appreciate further assistance, can be contacted at 63 Mill Lane, Ramsey.

One person who is researching that family lives near Nuneaton in Warwickshire. She is one of over 1,800 who have recorded their interests in the latest issue of the Cambridgeshire Family History Society's Directory, whose members pool their expertise.

They record their findings in the Society's Journal whose February issue includes articles on the Nash family of Fowlmere, The Tunwells of Fulbourn and the Bichenos from Over — volume three of whose story has recently been produced.

There are also articles about family and community health in Cambridge between 1876 and 1913 and the windmillers of Great Gransden. The mill is thought to date back to the 1670s but was the John Butterfield, who was killed by the mill sail in 1708, actually a victim of this mill, or was it another which probably stood on the Caxton road?

Society members would welcome assistance and are pleased to offer advice; contact the secretary Barbara Ward of 1 Ascham Lane, Whittlesford.

An insight into the early days of cycling has arrived with a few photographs and race cards. They relate to the Cambridge University Bicycle Club established to provide for their members a proper place to keep their bicycles, together with attendants to clean and look after the machines, maps and suggestions for excursions with instructions in riding and a supply of bikes to practice on. The bikes incidentally were of the Penny-farthing design with wheels up to 50" in diameter, thus making the tips on riding especially necessary,

In 1876 rules were laid down for those leading excursions since the sight of a mass of men on such machines might disturb other road users, especially horses, though if an animal showed signs of skittishness the advice was not to dismount, (even if the rider had learned how to do so) but to ride past slowly talking to the horse as they did so.

Pedestrians should also be passed with care and should not be shouted at needlessly for this - and the illegal practice of riding on the pavements - might create public prejudice against bicycling. Although much of the local landscape was flat there would inevitably be some hills to be negotiated and in these instances the party should maintain a distance of forty yards between each bicycle and be sure never to remove their feet from the treadles.

One undergraduate who became total master of his machine was Ion Keith-Falconer. On one day he biked all the way from Cambridge to Bournemouth, a distance of 150 miles while in 1882 he decided to cycle from Lands End to John o'Groats House, arriving at his destination, 994 miles away, in just under 13 days. His bike, a 58-incher built by Humber and Marriott of Nottingham survived well, though its rider was somewhat the worse for wear.

By then Keith-Falconer had decided on a life as a Missionary. He started in the disreputable area of Barnwell, just down Newmarket Road from the Colleges. A Sunday School had been established in 1825 but there were hundreds of poor and ignorant labourers, dirty, ragged and unkempt, behaving outrageously (at least to upper-crust Undergraduate eyes). Keith-Falconer and his companions hired the old Theatre Royal for a month-long evangelistic mission in 1875 and three years later 'were instrumental in buying and converting it into the Theatre Royal Barnwell Mission. It later became the Festival Theatre and its future is once more in course of discussion, Keith-Falconer went on to become University Professor of Arabic but retained his love of cycling, and especially cycle-racing. In 1874 he won a ten-mile race in 34 minutes and celebrated by biking to Trumpington on a massive 86-inch machine which he needed a flight to steps to reach. He repeated his success over 42 and 50 mile distances and broke record after record.

Then in October 1875 he beat the professional champion of the world over five miles, though Falconer confessed that he had gone into training in the nine days before the race by waking and retiring early, eating a proper diet and giving up smoking. A rematch was held in May 1879 over eight laps of the University's quarter-mile circuit on which occasion he won by just three inches, once more beating the fastest man in the world.

One of the programmes for the race survives as does a photograph which may show the undergraduate prodigy with his machine. Three days later he was racing again. He had been studying hard all morning and forgotten he was due to compete. It was not until all the other competitors were at the starting post that he rushed into the dressing room, changed his clothes as quickly as possible and mounted for the race. He rode several miles before recovering his breath but still beat the field at the end of the twenty mile contest in a record time!

Being Collectors ourselves we appreciate when others pass on to us duplicates from their own files. Recently this has included thirty music programmes of concerts dating back to February of 1945 when Myra Hess and the New London Orchestra performed a wartime concert of works by Mozart, Rossini and Hayden.

Our donor also drew attention to an extract from the autobiography of the Rev H.R. Haweis which gives an insight into the musical scene of nearly a century earlier. The Master of Trinity College was then Dr Whewell who had a reputation as an ogre and contrived to say something rude to everybody he knew, sooner or later. This changed in 1856 when the Master found a wife and the rugged old lion became affable, gentle and eager to do what he could to make people feel at home. Whewell himself had no ear for music though he could talk learnedly on the subject, attend concerts and organise music at his house. Haweis admitted to playing the fiddle - in fact it was common knowledge for he practiced noisily gaining a reputation as an undesirable neighbour and despite a 10pm curfew sounds of quartet or quintet would often go on till past midnight.

The Undergraduate was approached to perform solo at a concert of the University Musical Society to be attended by Whewell, where he was to be conducted by the new Professor of Music, W, Sterndale Bennett. Overcome with the pressure of the occasion Haweis accepted a glass of wine to sooth his nerves. Instead it went to his head which started to swim, his fingers went, limp and unrestrained, he played with exaggerated expression, tore the passion to tatters, trampled on the time. The audience listened in dead silence but then burst into applause at such an unconventional and daring new style. A second piece was received with fever pitch enthusiasm, men standing up and waving their caps and the new lad's reputation as a solo violinist was established.

Some time later he was disturbed in his rooms by a repeated knocking on the sported oak - the outer door which when closed is meant to indicate that the occupant does not wish to be interrupted. Finally he opened it to discover a very old strange figure in a sort of wide plaid waistcoat, well-made frock coat: heavily dyed thin whiskers, dark wig, yellow gloves and patent boots, He introduced himself as Mons Venus, a most famous violinist and conductor of some fifty years earlier who had seen Hayden conduct his Surprise Symphony, telling how the composer had demanded so loud a crash for the "Surprise" that the performer had burst his drum,

In the 1840s Venua had decided to take a band and chorus to Huntingdon despite the hazards of such a journey for anxious performers with delicate throats and valuable instruments to be cared for. Stagecoaches were packed with passengers and drums, double bases and scores of small packages and the retinue embarked. Disaster struck when one coach load overturned and prima donnas in their crinolines and frock-coated violinists sat by the wayside and bewailed their cruel fate. Somehow everything was put back together, the coach up-righted and the concert performed. Perhaps it was this which prompted Haweis to attempt a variation on the theme by announcing the performance by a fictitious foreign company in a town some fifteen miles from Cambridge. He and his friends disguised themselves in false beards, dressed themselves in heavy great coats, (though it was the middle of summer) and set off, Once more disaster struck when one of the most prominent residents was run over on the railway casting a gloom over the entire town and decimating the audience. The undergraduates returned crestfallen and ended up playing sadly in Cambridge market square in the middle of the night. It was not an experiment they repeated!

THERE can be few librarians charged with the collection of books and forgeries.

But for the librarian of the Cambridge Philatelic Society forgeries were most important. Club members regularly consulted them and were lectured on their qualities and failings.

Members were told that forgeries could be divided into two main classes, those counter-feited to deceive the Government and defraud the revenue (one example of this being the fake one shilling stamps used by the London Stock Exchange in 1938) while the larger fraud was aimed at genuine collectors.

In 1925 the Philatelic Congress of Great Britain met in Cambridge when one paper addressed the issue of "Thief Proof Stamps." In 1860 the population of Great Britain and Ireland was approximately 30 million and they posted more than 500 million letters, which averaged out to 100 letters per year to every inhabited house in the country. This provided a lucrative opportunity for the stamp thief.

It had long been the custom of the Post Office to buy back stamps which customers did not use, but there was no way of telling whether they had been legitimately acquired or stolen by some office clerk from the stamp drawer of his employer.

The Post Office, therefore, permitted employers to mark their stamps and these could not be negotiated. The first stamps to be so marked were those of the Union Society of Oxford University who had the letters "O.U.S" printed in red between two wavy lines. Later, firms could perforate their initials through the stamp but when the proprietors of Pears Soap sought to print an advertisement on the backs of the stamps the Post Office intervened.

In 1950 another speaker attracted a large audience for his account of when the Cambridge post went by Hobson's wagons. In those days it took three or more days for the six and eight-horse wagons to carry the post to London over the deeply rutted roads of the early 1600s. In 1635 the Government established a scheme for letters to be put in bags and delivered to towns on the route from London to Edinburgh.

They were taken from the Great North Road at Caxton and brought to Cambridge where they were delivered by a special foot post. It was 1792 when the first mail coach ran direct to Cambridge from London, covering the distance in seven and a half hours, reducing to five and a half hours by 1828.

One of the earliest post offices was in Bene't Street with others in Green Street and opposite Sidney Sussex college. Since T.F. Turton gave his talk there has been significant additional research with a Postal History of Cambridge by D.J. Muggleton being published in 1970. This, however, is too late to be included in the Cambridge Philatelic Society scrap-book which we have recently been allowed to copy for addition to the Cambridgeshire Collection.

Two other items caught my eye. One is a note that the 1938 Congress, also held in Cambridge, was filmed by a Mr H.C. Green. It featured scenes of local landmarks, including the hotels where delegates stayed, the views from their sight-seeing buses and a trip to Midsummer Fair. It would be wonderful if this could now be located.

The other is a warning to potential delegates which was written in 1763:
"Do not go to Cambridge, sir, there are ale houses-in which you will be drunk, there are tennis courts and bowling greens that will heat you in excess, and then you will drink cold small beer and die. "There is a river, too, in which you will be drowned and you will study yourself into a consumption and break your brains."

Reflections 1995 05 10

Two of Cambridge's villages have come under the spotlight recently with the publication of quite substantial histories by relatively new parishioners. One is an East Anglian estate village, the identity of the other is not disclosed.

It seems appropriate that the story of Chippenham should be recorded by a Rear Admiral since the Hall, which dominates the village and the book, was remodelled by Admiral Edward Russell whose naval career is detailed. Although he won the battle of Barfleur against the French (described by Winston Churchill as "the Trafalgar of the seventeenth century") Russell was later criticised and subsequently charged with corruption in that he sold ships and kept the money for himself. His career survived the scandal and he became Lord Lieutenant of Cambridgeshire, even entertaining the King at Chippenham in 1717.

When such an important personage decided to improve his home by demolishing some twenty-five houses, closing roads, and taking part of the High Street it was difficult for mere peasants to complain. The big house had full-size pictures of the Royal family in their Coronation robes, gold and silver wall hangings, green damaske curtains - even a painting of the famous battle against the French. His Lordship employed eighteen men, two boys and eight female staff in 1717 at an annual cost of just under £350. All this is documented, as are the problems of later generations including those of John Tharp in 1815. Due to "his inferiority of intellect" he was married off by his mother to the daughter of a Marquis, but there was no love on either side and the lad became unmanageable and be physically restrained. By then it was felt that the park expensive to be maintained and the hall extremely damp and ill-built - more a shooting box than a house which if left uninhabited for a season and without good fires would go to ruin. Doubtless the tenants in their hovels would have sympathised to a degree!

Admiral Ross continues the story to the present day highlighting the decline in facilities which prompted the vicar in 1972 to complain that the village was dying. Subsequently the school has closed but new residents have been attracted to this most unusual of local villages, bringing new life although very different from that of a few centuries ago.

By contrast there is no great house in Charles Moseley's hamlet, nor any tradition of domination of local life by outsiders. When he arrived just thirty years ago he was the interloper in a self-contained community; now such has been the change that he is considered an old-stager! In "A field full of folk" he charts the trials and tribulations, troubles and triumphs of restoring a run-down cottage. He introduces his former neighbours - Alfred the dirtiest man he'd ever known whose thick Cambridgeshire accent was made even less understandable by his voice having to escape past a roll-up that was perpetually at the corner of his mouth. Once he started to talk at you there was no alternative but to interpose an odd "oh" and "really" and wait until he stopped - making sure you stood upwind of him and idly counting the fly-specks on his glasses. Then there was Seth, the poacher -- "as innocent and harmless as only an elderly rogue can be" - who would follow behind the lawnmower with his scythe to prove it could do a better job. And how did Seth know that the village spinster, a respectable straight-backed figure, once had her pants held up by nineteen safety pins?

It all makes a most charming account of the life that was lived only the day before yesterday in one local village, perhaps your own

Faced with an 800 page biography of a Cambridge economist, theorist & educator- there I immediately scan the index for a clue as to what it is all about. But consult "Alfred Marshall" in the back of Peter- Groenewegen's book and one finds fourteen pages of double column entries - "Franco-Prussian war experiences", "growing impatience with metaphysical inquiry", "mathematising of Mill" and "touch of malaria in the Lake district" amongst them.

This is obviously not something that can be assessed easily - nor should it be when it has taken the author some ten years to research, three of them virtually full-time. Those at the official launch in the Marshall Library of Economics were fully appreciative of the importance of the subject - the man who established a separate economics and political sciences tripos and - incidentally - the opportunity to acquire a copy of the £60 book at special discount prices - economists obviously appreciating a bargain, though whether Alfred Marshall would have approved is perhaps another matter.

Denied an easy summary there is no alternative but to peruse the entire volume and appreciate Marshall's theories such as his wish "to jettison the pessimistic conclusions of classical economics on the future possibilities for the working class, inherent in its perspectives on the stationary state and in the limitations implied for human progress from its laws of population and wages, which permanently tied workers to low incomes", a proposition which one could doubtless debate at some length as the Professor of Economics and Director of the Centre for the Study of the History of Economic Thought, University of Sidney proceeds to do.

Yet this is no dry-as-dust book for the serious academic alone for it provides also a fascinating insight into Alfred Marshall the man and his personal life. In 1939 John Maynard Keynes was invited to tea by Marshall's widow, The food was on the Spartan side and the one-sided conversation comprised a continual diatribe about what a jealous and selfish intellectual wretch her husband had been.

The couple had first met when Alfred lectured at Newnham college in 1871 at a time when women's education was much in its infancy. A year later she took the initiative by inviting him to dance "The Lancers", and later attended social evenings in his bachelor rooms at St John's college. They married in 1877 by which time they were both were teaching political economy. Political and economic reality meant that Marshall now had to give up his teaching post at Cambridge, Fellows being not allowed to marry, and start a new career at Bristol University. They took with them oddments of furniture that he had purchased from second-hand shops and friends noticed that their tastes conflicted somewhat, she preferring much brighter colourings.

In 1884 Alfred was elected to the Chair of political economy back in Cambridge and they soon were house-hunting. St John's College was then developing land along Grange Road, but only allowing the construction of houses costing more than £2,000. Marshall was adamant he would only spend half that amount so he had to settle for Madingley Road where he build Balliol Croft, to his designs, economising on smaller items such as the kitchen - although one guest thought this the most comfortable room in the house. They employed a single maid who had fits of gloomy depression and always threatened to resign - perhaps because Alfred was rather fussy and would explain to ladies how they ought to dust their rooms. Here he was able to continue to write his important books and pursue his increasing hostility over women's education - their families ought to come first - a cause his wife was supporting. At the end of his life many personal papers were destroyed buy enough have survived to ensure that this biography is equally interesting to both the academic and her husband.

James Reynolds Withers was born at Weston Colville, near Newmarket in May 1842. His father had been village shoemaker but had fallen on bad times so when the boy was born he was a less than welcome addition to the family's precarious budget. There was no money for schooling so the lad was sent out at an early age to pick stones, weed corn and scare birds, gaining what little education he could from his mother as she sat and stitched from morning to night.

Writing he never cared for and arithmetic left him cold but he did learn to read the old ballads and broadsheets that found their way into the village. As he watched the farmer's sheep he read of Robin Good, Robinson Crusoe and Pilgrim's Progress and also absorbed something of the natural life around him, the flowers of the fields and the birds he was employed to keep in the air.

When aged 12 he went to work for a market gardener at Fordham, finding more reading matter in the tattered pages from Shakespeare amongst the waste paper from which he made seed bags. There was much more reading at Magdalene College, Cambridge, so there he went – not as a student but as under-porter, though he soon felt confined in the bustle of the town and returned once more to his old job and old wage.

Good fortune came his way in the form of a legacy from his deceased grandmother with which he entered into his father's old trade, learning from the man who had succeeded to that business. It was not a success, he returned to Fordham, took a wife, started a family and failed to earn enough to support them. In 1846 in desperation he turned to the workhouse for relief.

All the while he was composing rhymes – though his lack of writing made it difficult for him to set them down until a farmer's wife took notice of him and funded his first volume of poetry, published in 1854. Two years later a second volume appeared and Macmillan's Magazine of 1860 hailed him as Cambridgeshire's hedge-side poet.

His fame spread, he travelled to Windsor, Bath and Bristol, and received many letters of encouragement from Charles Dickens, Queen Victoria – who included a welcome gift of £50 – and Tom Hughes, author of "Tom Brown's School-days". His output and his income increased but soon his literary friends passed a way and his capital was lost in a disastrous investment, though villagers in Fordham rallied round to ensure he could continue to live a thrifty life in his cottage.

When he lost his daughter and then his wife, one of his remaining admirers built him a house in the north of London, though Withers decided to stay in Cambridgeshire until his death in 1892

His verses covered many topics, some of them local: Fordham Fire Brigade –
"They all stand ready, fully equip'd, against the hour of need",

Wicken –

Going to your church, is like going out of town,
Not pleasant at all when the rain is coming down and his native village of Weston Colville –

The foot-paths leading through the fields and groves,
Where once a careless boy I loved to rove,
Are overturned by the encroaching plough;
And I should trespass if I walked there now.

Others deal with the hardship of life including a complaint to the lady whose cow insisted on eating his flowers:

“And when I try and frighten her, and stamp and loudly bawl,
She licks her nose and coughs and stares, and does not mind at all”

and a description of life at Newmarket workhouse—

“Two days in the week we’ve puddings for dinner,
And two we have broth, so like water, but thinner”

Recently we have received even more samples of his work and on 30th June at a celebration of English songs to be held at Beechurst Hall, Soham Village College, there will be given a first performance of a setting of one of Wither’s poems whilst a small display will chronicle something of the life and times of one of Cambridgeshire’s most famous, yet almost forgotten Victorian poets

It must be boring having law-abiding ancestors. Let a man live a frugal, blameless life and raise a god-fearing and sober family and the chances are that he will appear as but a name in the annals of history. But let just one of the family stray from the paths of righteousness and all the world may learn of it.

This at least is the opinion of Cedric Parcel who has ventured to research the story of Parcells past. From their early ancestry at Patishall in Northamptonshire the story progresses through an Ashwell connection to a humble cottage in the village of Wendy in the 1730s where Piomer and Ann Parcel1 struggled to cope with poverty and a family of five girls - all of whom died - and a single son, William. The lad was apprenticed to a shoemaker in the village at a time when prices were rising, wages hard to find and the news of revolution in France had made the English ruling classes nervous, with hangings and transportation brought in to counter the talk of rebellion and the outbreaks of incendiarism.

William took a bride in 1734 when the price of a loaf had risen from 7d (3p) to 1/2 (6p) in three years. The cobblers shop was within sight of the parish stocks and their four sons were given good Biblical names. In 1804 they moved to Orwell where perhaps more labourers would feel able to devote some of their harvest wages to supplying themselves with the good strong boots that William supplied, providing some income to set aside the mere patching and mending that would have to suffice for the rest of the year. Somehow they survived and raised more sons till in 1826 William sold his cottage and aged 52 disappeared from the record books. Perhaps his eyesight had failed, or rheumatism brought on by years crouched over his last may have taken its toll., Doubtless however his first-born. Hall, would have added to his problems.

The lad had been in trouble from an early age and imprisoned for six months for the theft of trees. Then in 1820 he collected two sacks of potatoes from Daniel Cartwright of Gamlingay, claiming they were for Robert Taylor, a local blacksmith. The fraud was detected and Hall Parcel found himself sentenced to seven years transportation - his previous convictions prompting such a severe punishment.

He was taken to the hulks to await transportation and incarcerated in the old wooden warship "Leviathan" in Portsmouth harbour. For eleven months he was kept in the rotting, decaying hulk, infested with rats and cockroaches, rowed ashore to work in chains by day, and battered down between decks at night with a 14 lb bail shackled to his ankle to discourage any idea of jumping overboard. Then on 19th November 1821 the Orwell lad together with 183 other criminals were transferred to the "Phoenix", a convict ship bound for Van Diemens Land, to be exiled for ever.

The long sea voyage to Australia in the days of sail was no light undertaking. To travel as a convict, confined in quarters which were dark, gloomy and utterly foul was awful. Water seeped through the ships seams and the convict's bunks and bedding could not be kept dry. In heavy seas it was not uncommon for the prisoners to find themselves washed from their bunks by a swirling mass of water. The stench was indescribable, especially in the sweltering heat of the tropics when stale bilge water, mouldy rotten timber and the odours of closely-packed humanity made it surprising that so many survived the conditions.

Hall Parcell survived the journey and the hardships to follow; twenty-two years after his fraud he was released and was never heard of again. However the Parcel name continued in Australia as it has in New Zealand and America, all of which come together in "Parcel past"

THE border country of Scotland is beautiful and peaceful, the old and ruined castles a back-drop to forgotten conflicts. To that far country I had gone to speak to a conference of the Scottish Library Association held in the magnificent Hydro Hotel in Peebles.

My presentation contrived to bring in not only the Scots King Malcolm III who led his troops to the assistance of Fenland's Hereward the Wake but also 'Dennis of Grunty Fen', the 'Weekly News' and a CD-ROM on Robert Burns produced by a Cambridgeshire software company.

Back in Cambridge and the Collection I found that conflict had been far from forgotten in my absence. Out of a batch of new acquisitions four related to a war we should never forget. From Sawston, Whittlesford and Burwell have come accounts of their village at war, but presented in different ways. Sawston puts the local scene into its national context and emphasises the aerial activities, due in part to their proximity to Duxford airfield, but also gives details of the production of paper by the Spicer company - and of their development of the early 'Dufaycolour' film.

Whittlesford's booklet provides a most welcome detailed account of the role of the Home Guard whose armoury included Molotov cocktails and larger do-it-yourself firebombs made from old five-gallon oil drums which were installed in batteries of up to eight dug into the banks at the side of the road.

When needed, an explosive charge would - hopefully - hurl them towards the road producing a sheet of flame intending to cascade on to passing vehicles.

From Burwell have come a compilation of villager's memories, including that of a medical student who answered an appeal to work at Belsen concentration camp and a personal account by Eileen Mason who worked at Shorts Repair Hangers, Madingley Road, Cambridge. On one occasion she looked into one of the gun turrets of the Stirling bomber she was rivetting and saw an airman's jacket peppered into the back and sides of the turret by bullets.

He must have been shot to bits.

We would welcome any other such accounts or programmes produced to commemorate the end of the Second, or any other, war so that we can continue to ensure that future researchers can have an insight into the present and past of Cambridgeshire

Seventy years ago Arthur Almond published a booklet on a subject of which he was a Master - college gowns. He was the son of a Sheringham schoolmaster who made an early career as a furniture dealer, rising in 13 years from junior to manager. In 1886 he sought a change of direction and purchased & tailoring business near Downing College, moving to Sidney Street about 1831: He took an active interest in the Congregational church and the League of Nations and was elected to the Town council on behalf of the Liberal Party, holding a seat in Abbey Ward between 1913 and 1921. He served on various committees, including that of Libraries and Town Planning as well as the Local Employment Committee, endeavouring to find ways of building new jobs during the severe period of recession, He was also a trustee of the Barnwell Theatre until it became the Festival.

But in 1924 he decided to turn his attention to something that had long puzzled him : when had the various Undergraduate Gowns been introduced. The first mention of Gowns seem to have been in 1585 when Lord Burleigh, then Chancellor, had made orders governing student dress ; "They might walk in cloake and hatt to and fro the fields, Also within his College, Hall, Hostel or Habitation it was lawful for any student to wear a gowne, or gaberdyne of playne Turkye fashion with a round failing cap without garde, welte lace, cutt or silks except one cutt in the sleeves thereof to putt out his armes onllye" - this latter probably only allowed when dining, for otherwise they should be concealed.

With this was to go a square cap or in certain clearly defined cases a hat "for infirmities sake with a kerchiffe about his head ,, when it shall happen to rayne, hayle or snow; the hatt which shall be worne to be blacke ... and not excessive in bigness, without feather brooche or such lyke uncomelye for Students"

All this Almond could find by referring to various books, but at some stage the sleeveless gown - known as a Curtain - had become superceded by gowns of different colours and shapes. Almond wrote to the various colleges seeking advice from their senior dons but to little result. Christ's college replied that their order book between 1818 and 1842 was missing, most of Emmanuel's records had been destroyed and Pembroke college suggested he contact Messrs Ryder and Amies (another gownmaker). Others racked their memories and suggested avenues of approach but Caius did find a resolution dated May 1837 "To adopt a new gown next October", though it was Corpus who came up with the earliest date, 1827.

Having gathered together the evidence Almond needed a publisher, Bowes and Bowes at first declined to oblige, though their name appears on the pamphlet entitled "Gowns and Gossip", 500 copies of which cost £16.10.0. Almond now embarked on another round of letter writing, despatching copies to interested parties and back came letters of thanks, including that of the Borough Librarian for the copy still held in the Cambridgeshire Collection. These letters together with other incidental notes have now found their way into the Collection.

But Almond's small booklet caused a storm over his definition of a blazer ; named, he claimed, from the scarlet coat made for Lady Margaret Boat Club , whose vivid colour was applied to other similar garments. It had been devised by Reuben Buttress, formerly chapel clerk at St John's but no date was given. From Queen's college Oxford came a letter seeking further information and speculating that the term had first originated there. This prompted Almond to another round of correspondence and letters came back from the Royal Historical Society as well as the Borough Librarian dating Buttress' business in St John's street as between 1841 and 1854. Quite probably the question has been fully resolved since 1925. If not somebody will doubtless tell us and add to the story of Cambridge gowns

Some weeks seem much longer than others; all the enquiries seem more complicated, and just as you start something the telephone rings again. Last week was one such - and then by some bit of mismanagement on my part I found that I was no longer able to get home before it was time to turn out again for a talk and it was necessary to pull out the last reserves of energy for a 12-hour day. Half way across Market Hill I remembered I had left the slides back in the Library and it was a case of retracing footsteps and climbing the stairs again. Finally driving out to Linton it was easy to wonder whether it was worth the effort.

A welcoming group, friendly faces able to identify scenes of the area taken 60 years before and share memories of the days when they had no option but to work from dawn to dusk, but best of all the opportunity to reacquaint myself with the notebook of Henry Pamment which I had borrowed and transcribed some years ago and - as I was proudly reminded - had broadcast extracts on the wireless. Its handwritten pages records the life and struggles of a local lad whose arrival in the world had coincided with the Harvest Hoke, causing his father to be called away from the roast beef and plum puddings to run puffing and blowing for the doctor just because such a lad as he had arrived. Early childhood happiness soon gave way to stone-picking despair and eventually the realisation that there was nothing for him in Linton, so it was off to London to seek his fortune. Like thousands before and since he found that fortune was a mixed commodity and returned home to further hardship, and some hope. Through the pages of the notebook we can appreciate his trials and tribulations, without it Henry Pamment would only be a name in the church registers.

But for the scratched name on a Linton brick Robert Webbe might be equally obscure but it prompted an inquisitive schoolboy to seek further information without much success, though "probably many documents ... were locked away in libraries and record offices to which school boys could not easily gain access". However within a year or two Matthew Manning had actually met him, they had spoken, given each other gifts and nearly shaken hands. The only thing was that Robert Webbe had died in 1733. Matthew travelled the world talking about his friend and showing pictures of all the signatures that had mysteriously appeared on his bedroom walls - not just names from the eighteenth century but those of Bertrand Russell, Henry Cooper and Elizabeth Taylor (though presumably these were not those we know today); paintings and sketches by Durer and Aubrey Beardsley also manifested themselves.

Matthew wrote books about his experiences one of which "The strangers" issued in 1978 is entirely devoted to his Linton home (but then why did I not spot it until last week!). I have however acquired a copy of the Proceedings of the Society for Psychical Research for October 1994 which analyses the signatures - some upside down in inaccessible corners of the ceiling, out of reach of human hands. It considers the possibilities of eidetic imagery, cryptomnesia or honest fraud, and tries once more to investigate the ghostly Robert Webbe.

Like Manning they search documents in Record Offices and church chests for possible clues without result.

There is another mystery. Of all the Cambridge antiquarians one of the most prolific was William Mortlock Palmer, a doctor based in Linton for many years. Palmer visited hundreds of patients and learned of many family treasures - such as the Pamment notebook - which might have been passed to him for safekeeping. Palmer wrote dozens of books and articles which he deposited in Linton library - freely open to all schoolboys. Why then is his a name that is overlooked by researcher or schoolboy psychic?

It was a week that began, and nearly ended, on the banks of the Cam. Friday evening - with Saturday still to work - saw a gathering of friends and colleagues to bid farewell to Anne Cooper who after 17 years dedicated service to the County Record Office is starting a new life and career elsewhere. The venue was a former pub called Paradise on a little island in the Cam. Formerly belonging to Hudson's Brewery of Pampisford and famed for its home brewed ales, it is now a private house standing high above the surrounding grassland, though floodwater has been heard under the raised floorboards in years gone by. That evening as glasses were raised and nibbles consumed young people in punts glided past en route to Grantchester, discovering the delights that were hidden just around the next bend in the muddy stream.

Nearly 200 years earlier the Rev James Plumptre made a similar exploration to the source of the Cam, setting off from Clare College "with our garters on our legs and our staffs in our hands, and a change of linen in our pockets". Soon, "crossing the new turnpike road from Camb, into the great north road we got into a Lane which leads into Paradise, But wherefore it has acquired that name I know not, as it consists only of gravel-pit-pools overgrown with willow herbs and coltsfoot etc and surrounded by trees: the place contains good studies for broken ground, but is not paradisaical",

He appreciated subsequent sights more and at Harston joined the village men, women and children at the muscle fishery - poking sticks into the opened shells and pulling them out hanging fast upon the wood. The fish itself was not of any interest, but the shells were much prized and found a ready sale. On and on they went past Haslingfield and Barrington - where the food was indifferent but the civility of the host made ample amends for any deficiencies of fare - to Arrington where the view was one of the finest in the land. Plumptre ought to know for he was famed for his walking tours and had previously journeyed to the Highlands of Scotland and wilds of Wales. Why he wondered did travellers explore distant regions "whilst their own Country has been unnoticed, tho constantly spread out before their eyes and easy of access"

Similar sentiments might have been echoed by the dozens of people who, the Sunday before, had assembled at Waterbeach to explore the Cam en route to Ely and mark the official opening of The Fen Rivers way. Some found the companionship and conversation so interesting that they forgot to admire the scenery - or that part of it which could be appreciated through the dampness and drizzle of a June day. On arrival at Upware - formerly more renowned for its scraps between University and fenmen during the days of the Upware republic or the subsequent rule of the self-proclaimed King, Richard Ramsey Fielder - the party paused for refreshment and to witness the formal cutting of the ribbon strung across the newly-cleared and accessible track, the result of hard work between the County Council's Rural Group and the various parish councils and parishioners along the way. There too was launched a most informative pack including explanatory history, notes about connecting buses and a detailed route map which also gives hints on a separate series of walks just off the new long-distance footpath.

Then the intrepid journeyers were off once more, knowing that although "Fives miles from Anywhere" there was no hurry, and no worry either that they would need what was previously indispensable to earlier travellers - a large pole with which they could try and jump the deep wide ditches that might have previously impeded their progress

SOME 30 years ago when the Central Library was at the back of the Guildhall and the Cambridgeshire Collection still crammed into the cupboard at the back of the Reference Library I undertook the job of compiling a list of Who's Where in Cambridgeshire monumental brass.

This later developed into a guide for brass-rubbers and ran to several duplicated editions. Seeking the information meant scanning a variety of books, including the Transactions of the Monumental Brass Society — which one would expect to have the information — and a little guide to Rides around Cambridgeshire by a former vicar of Barrington which was designed to assist cyclists but also contained one of the most comprehensive lists of local brasses.

Then there was the Cambridge Camden Society's 1846 volume of Illustrations of Monumental Brasses covering brasses from around the country which sought to find details about the people it featured.

However, Dr John Blodwell of Balsham is largely unknown, though the inscription around his brass proclaims that he came from Shropshire, studied law and then took holy orders. By 1439 he held the rectory of Balsham by which time he was probably suffering from blindness and died in 1462. The antiquarians debated and deciphered the meaning of the Latin inscription around his brass figure, speculated about the saints surrounding him and on the history of the church in which he rests.

Blodwell survived the visit of the puritan William Dowsing in 1643 who destroyed superstitious pictures, crosses and sculptures but not the activities of the Victorians. For in August 1836 excavations were made at the head of his tomb to the depth of three or four feet where his skeleton was discovered surrounded by fragments of his coffin. No remains of any funeral garments had survived and his skull they noticed was thin and old, with only two teeth remaining.

Having conducted their researches the tomb was closed up again and they turned their attention to other monuments in the churchyard.

Such details are omitted from a new and comprehensive guide to the Monumental brasses of Cambridgeshire which describes and illustrates many of the ancient memorials, pointing out details such as the set-square and dividers incorporated into the canopy of George Basevi, architect of the Fitzwilliam Museum (a copy of the plan of which he holds), but not telling how he fell to his death from scaffolding at Ely Cathedral.

Basevi and Blodwell, Sir Roger de Trumpington and Thomas Peyton — all famous brasses — feature in the index, but so do many other much more recent and much less grand people. For the authors have scanned each church and located and listed simple memorials to those who gave pianos or tables, modern lecterns or seats and whose names are recorded on small brass plaques in the buildings in which they worshipped just as others had done in the centuries before.

In 1911 Julian Julian had a problem. As Borough Surveyor it was his job to work out how best various essential functions could be most effectively undertaken once the previously independent area of Chesterton actually became part of Cambridge.

Finally in November he was ready to present his findings to members of the Paving,, Drainage and Lighting Committee in a report newly acquired by the Collection

One thing was obvious - new areas to cope with must mean more staff - for the moment - he could manage with just four more men. Motors he was less sure about. At present the Corporation hired transport, paying 7/- (35p) a day for horse. harness and driver with an extra sixpence (2.5p) if the contractor provided a cart. But a motor vehicle would cost £600 and 27/- per day to work – including repairs, renewals, fuel, driver etc.

His calculations go on and on but finally he concludes that if horse hire charges do not increase then they should stay as they are. However they should also consider the sanitary advantages of using motors, though putting this against the noise and vibration caused.

Julian then turns his attention to scavenging. In 1911 there were four miles of streets in the town centre which were constantly cleared, some sections being cleansed 12 times a day. He also pointed out that although bye-laws required householders to clean the footpaths in front of their houses few did so, and many shopkeepers swept out their premises into the streets after the scavengers had already done their rounds.

Councillors should also remember that whereas house refuse was collected without charge, garden rubbish was not accepted at all in Cambridge - but residents of Chesterton could have it taken away free and would be sure to raise a stink if the proposed amalgamation removed this service

If all of this seems unchanging the poor Surveyor had other problems not faced by his modern equivalent - street watering. Nearly 10,000 gallons of water a year were spread on the town's roads. Many of the streets were only watered twice a day but the main route from the Station to the town centre had to be sprayed six times daily. People did argue that if the roads were tarred this would lead to a reduction in watering but experience actually showed that residents expected just as regular a service because the dust from neighbouring untarred roads was blown on to their streets. If a whole district were to be tarred then they would be able to use a van with a finer sprinkler but until then the same amount had to be spread whether it was needed or not.

Put it all together and they would need another 3 water vans, 2 picking-up vans, 5 ashes vans, 2 gully carts and a horse broom - total cost £550 - in addition to those which would be inherited from Chesterton Urban Council. Of course if the motor traffic did increase the situation could be looked at again

"Oh, Nurse., it's like 'eaven" : such was the verdict of some of the mangled men who found themselves in Cambridgeshire convalescent hospitals in the early days of the Great War.

The first opened on 2nd November 1914 for wounded Belgian soldiers when England was full of Belgian refugees and patients from the hospitals of Antwerp, whilst the English military hospitals were full to overflowing with our own wounded from Flanders. Three large empty houses in Cintra terrace, Hills Road, were placed at the disposal of the Cambridge Women's Voluntary Aid Detachment and the girls who had been practising since the outbreak of war and allowed to learn the practical side of nursing at Addenbrooke's Hospital now had a Hospital of their own.

The houses were swept and scrubbed and the girls drove around Cambridge collecting the furniture which had been promised by the Red Cross Society, and when the van failed to appear went out with a handcart to bring in mattresses, coalscuttles, glasses, dish-cloths and all the other essentials.

Despite all their efforts Cintra House was poorly fashioned and inconvenient and lasted only a few months. But then homes for wounded Tommies sprang up, each receiving men who had been treated in the First Eastern General Hospital but needed time to recover their health and strength with more individual attention to cheer him and hearten him up.

There were three in Cambridge: St. Chads on Grange Road with lofty sunny rooms facing south, croquet on the lawn, and a recreation room with billiard table, Wordsworth Grove, under the Command of Alex Wood arranged concerts each week and a Hospital band of patients and staff provided much mirth, whilst "Huntly" in Herschel Road arranged regular visits from a conjuror.

In surrounding villages accommodation varied as Church Schools (Fulbourn) and Baptist schoolrooms (Cottenham), Parish Rooms (Willingham), Halls (Shepreth) and Institutes (Whittlesford) were pressed into service. The Belgians who first arrived at Linton were housed in a wing of the Workhouse but this was not considered so suitable for British lads who moved to the Manor House.

Those based at Mount Blow., Great Shelford had sunny rooms facing south with lovely views and even a chalk pit which had been adapted to form a miniature rifle range - so they could practice shooting once again.

Some idea of "heaven" has been recorded in an album of photographs of Milton Hall, just lent to us. There are the stately rooms with beds under the family portraits, the attendant nurses, the camp band, mock battles, badger hunting, food and frolics. There is also a tribute in verse to "the finest band of nurses old England's ever seen" And when the war is over and England's done her all, We won't forget the nurses we had at Milton Hall"

There is just one snag - our Milton Hall never took wounded soldiers, not did it look like the house depicted - so where in the world was it

An unauthorised biography of an eminent writer might be sure to cause some difficulties to the subject especially if there are skeletons in the cupboard, a history of money problems and a certain amount of sexual scandal. However even if the subject does not like the book the reader is likely to find much to interest.

In "Romantic egotist" we are introduced to an author with distinct Cambridgeshire connections., one of the most fascinating and complex literary and media figures with a private life of bewildering complexity.

The son of a first-world-war soldier whose father's business had, reputedly, collapsed forcing him to flee to escape his creditors - a claim disputed by other members of the family - the embryonic writer knew little of his father, having been conceived whilst he was lying badly wounded in a hospital bed and soon to be shipped back to France and death. His mother coped well with a family and a tea-shop until a rogue named Monty entered their lives. Dressed partly in army gear - a useful source of clothing for the poorer classes once the war had ended - he won her affection. A decided con-man he used the upper rooms of the shop for storing stolen goods - once even pinching cutlery from the tea-shop and joining in a police hunt for the missing items. Nobody knew whether they actually legally married but soon there was another child - and the new father vanished with a very young waitress.

The family moved to Meldreth, but no rent was paid and it was time to make a moonlight flit, their furniture loaded on to a primitive pick-up truck and the children tied with ropes on to the sofa - making a terrific commotion as they trundled through the streets of Cambridge en route to their new home. They arrived at Burwell to find the accommodation roofless but kindly neighbours gave them shelter whilst the furniture remained outdoors, lined up down the garden path and was almost ruined in the torrential rain.

Here the budding author went to school and earned pocket money by running errands for an eccentric chemist whose reputation derived from an interest in unwanted cats that were due to be put down. The lad would be given a cat-basket and the bus fare and brought the animals back to the shop. Then they would be killed so that his employer could experiment in resurrecting them! Fertile grounding indeed for the embryo novelist who spent much of his time reading crime stories from the local library and sending off articles which were constantly rejected. He even sought employment at the Cambridge Daily News without success. When, much later, that paper published extracts from one of his books it caused some consternation as he had named real people in the mistaken belief that they would have died.

Though never achieving the success of a Jeffrey Archer, Jack Trevor Story became a much-admired writer's writer who never forgot his Burwell boyhood and his Cambridgeshire experiences

IN the oppressive heat of a July Saturday I peruse the piles of newly acquired Cambridgeshire titles - murder mysteries, biographies, even more planning reports, and seek inspiration. Poetry seems to outnumber all other topics so perhaps there might be something there for a light recreational read.

"Last train to Ely" by Edward Storey laments and records the harsh days of the past - the work of the river-maker who with muscle and spade drained the wildfowl's roosting-place to provided a soil which has fed man's children for three hundred years but which is now being covered by iron and brick as more and more houses submerge once-drowned fields.

My reinterpretation of others of his words might not find favour for in an introduction to "Fen and Ink", an anthology of new writing from East Cambridgeshire Storey offers advice - avoid such phrases as "cotton-wool clouds" and "blankets of snow" and especially careless repetition like "At first my parents at first..."

He continues "I make these points to persuade would-be contributors to take another look at their work before sending it out". I turn the page and the first line repeats: "work before sending it out". Oops!

So if not poetry how about song? Three new cassettes from Jancis Harvey have recently been added to our stock. Jancis sings gentle songs about the local area, extolling the wonders of Suffolk- and Cambridgeshire, church bells and gently-flowing Cam.

But just when nicely lulled into a feeling of serenity she hits you with the story of the gypsy boy whose lonely grave by the roadside recalls the personal tragedy of a miscounted flock of sheep and the even greater disaster of the Fire of Burwell. There, in September 1727, over eighty local men, women and children died when the barn in which they had gathered to watch a puppet show caught fire. Thomas Howe, 16 years old, saw it all: "Everybody was thrown into terror, they were surrounded by straw, they rushed towards the door but that opened inwards and they'd put the table they used for the conjuring tricks against it. The crush was so great they couldn't open it." I heard old Shepheard the puppet man call out to his wife and say 'we shall certainly be burned'- that he was." Jancis' account may be less graphic, but however told the tale is terrible.

Perhaps the gently turning sails of Swaffham Prior windmills might more appropriately reflect Summer Sundays and these have just been featured in a new video by Ron Prime. There is something tranquil about watching drive the mighty cogs and stones inside as they carry out their age-old task of grinding corn into flour. But the restoration work which was needed to provide this illusion was immense - 15 years' labour and over £50,000 so that breadmakers may have the proper ingredients.

Meanwhile across the road a second mill, of particularly rare design has been transformed into a house and office, despite the Planners initial rejection of the proposals.

PARISH magazines are a regular, monthly addition to the Collection; they convey something of the community life and concerns current-ly occupying the minds of some of the local residents.

Last week however we were lucky enough to be given a file of the magazine which circu-lated to the various parishes in the Camps Deanery some 100 or so years ago and I thought it might be interesting to consider some of the issues of those days.

At that time - before television, radio or Sunday newspaper supplements - the parish magazine would have provided cottagers with perhaps their principal reading material and the local news was supplemented by a nationally-produced magazine, in this case "The Church Monthly".

This provided an insight into the world beyond the parish confines - Switzerland and Cashmere, Macclesfield and Norwich.

There were articles on the keeping of backyard hens - be sure not to keep a cock so save "annoying the neighbours, over-the-wall conversation, complaints to the newspapers on the cock-crowing nuisance, solicitors letters, and a sundry visit to the police-court" (and we thought these were modern complaints).

And how a Norfolk churchman, Mr John Abbey, had invented a new series of drinks to replace beer for harvest workers - Stokos, Hopkos and Cokos - the latter made with oatmeal, cocoa and sugar which cost 4d a gallon and could be carried to the fields in a stone jar.

When there was time to read, various stories could while away the time before bed, of Susan, whose Lincolnshire cottage was always spick and span, and her neighbour Ann "who put off every kind of household work to the last possible minute ... allowed pots, pans and crockery to rust into holes, or get cracked or spoiled for want of cleanliness and care, then borrowed her neighbour's belongings to make up for those she lacked". Which, I wonder, was to become "The real owner of Swallowdale" of the serial.

Meanwhile the local villagers were concerned about the necessary repairs to the parish churches at Babraham, Balsham and Bartlow, how the Sunday school treat was rained off at Whittlesford and what the Inspectors said of the school at Linton.

There were innovations - incandescent light at Sawston church, though this had not deterred some sacrilegious soul from stealing from the Alms box for the Waifs and Strays (and coincidentally "The Church Monthly" shortly afterwards devoted one of its full-page engravings to a mother and daughter adding their mite into just such a box)

Not all youngsters were beyond reproach however for Sawston parents were urged to control smoking in their children - "it is common to see boys not ten years old smoking about the streets with monkey-like impudence; and the other day we actually saw a child of five puffing gravely at the pernicious cigarette".

With their mixture of local and international news and their interesting illustrations old Parish Magazines are a most welcome addition to the Collection and we should appreciate any more for our files.

Two fighting doctors have - unknown to each other - donated items to the Collection in the same week.

Dr David H Clark came to Cambridge in 1938 determined to row and to study medicine. But it was not the time when carefree studies were to be on the agenda for long and he expected to be called up as an artillery officer in the impending war. To his surprise he was ordered to complete medical training.

By July of 1943 he was a Lieutenant in the RAMC but it was not until December 1944 that he finally saw action. Later he parachuted into Germany and was hit in the belly - the shrapnel fragment smashing through his clothing but without power enough to enter the skin. His luck had held, his skill was to save other lives - of German prisoners captured by Russians, of Dutch prisoners captured by Japanese in Sumatra.

Clark travelled on to Singapore and Palestine before returning to his native Edinburgh to study psychiatry., and then back to Addenbrooke's and Fulbourn hospitals to practice his skills in the more peaceful atmosphere of Cambridge.

Of Leonard S Danzig I know but little, but his fight against Nazidom brought him to Europe from New Jersey and in 1946 he found himself in Cambridge. I met him following a lecture at Emmanuel college as part of a course organised by the Cambridge University Board of Continuing Education. Previously he had studied at Bull College at an education programme arranged by the US army.,

Bull College is now on no tourist map but during the war the Bull Hotel, Trumpington Street, was converted into a hostel administered by the American Red Cross. When the war was won American servicemen were invited to spend a term studying in Cambridge and Leonard arrived with the second contingent in Lent 1946.

By then there had been changes, students were no longer billeted in the centre of town but instead studied under barrack-room conditions at Brooklands Avenue. If this robbed them of the ambience they had expected they could still participate in the sporting life - baseball,, rugger, darts, table-tennis - one representing Cambridge University in a match against Oxford - and of course rowing where they made history by appointing a woman cox - and their boat rammed and split the St. Catharine's shell in two!

All that was nearly 50 years ago. Now Dr Danzig an expert in cariovascular disease and still in New Jersey, was back. He brought with him some snapshots of the staff who made his first stay enjoyable. one of which he has left in the Collection. We in turn gave him a copy of "The Cambridge Bull", the magazine produced by the students in 1946, which he had not bought at the time, and which contains a photograph of himself as a Cambridge student all those years ago.,

The story of the popular theatre in Cambridge around the turn of the century is one that has still to be written..

It would doubtless record the debate and discussion over the use of the old Corn Exchange once the present buildings had been opened and how it was used as an indoor shopping centre until 1884 after which Ernie Hayward, and enterprising local concert promoter, opened it as a Variety Music Hall. For a while it was successful but then the deep frost between December 1894 to March 1895 proved its downfall. Other entrepreneurs took the opportunity to flood three fields in Newnham and install electric light. Skaters flocked there in droves, emptying the Arcade which was forced to cancel a Marie Lloyd concert and close.

Its place was taken by the New Theatre just around the corner in St. Andrew's Street which opened in 1896 shortly after the University surrendered its powers to limit theatrical performances during term time. It suffered from undergraduate excesses - on one occasion in 1903 the play was stopped and three of them expelled - but successfully fought off proposals for a new Palace of Varieties in Auckland Road in 1902 and survived the competition from the more upmarket Festival Theatre after 1926.

The story of the Cambridge Pierrots troupe who gave their first performance in 1898. the Rodney dramatic club. the Excelsior and X-L-C-R minstrels will all have their place but what of Coulson and company?

We have just acquired a list of theatrical and carnival goods available from Coulson's theatrical stores in St. Andrew's street. The business flourished from about 1910 into the 1950s and our 56-page catalogue is undated.

It was however at a time when you could dress as King Charles for 12/6 (62p), Cromwell for 10/6 (52p) or Charlie Chaplin for 7/6 (38p) - for which same price you could act as a Professor, parson or "Bing Boy". There were wigs and beards to be hired or bought, eyebrow pencils and grease paint sets, cheap scenery for amateur productions — even second-hand tights from 1/11 (20p),, Desperadoes could invest in papier mache revolvers or realistic daggers but those who wished to deceive could invest just 2/6 (12p) for the secrets of a modern magician.

The Wandering Coin and the Magnetic Card - where a marked coin dropped in a glass of water vanishes only to reappear from a pack of cards, the Indian Rope Trick and the New Guinea Band could all be yours and, given just fifteen minutes practice, you could make a career on the music Hall Stage and puzzle the most astute audiences.

Our catalogue was once owned by "W.F.H". He purchased gum for fixing moustaches, crepe hair for making beards and horn rimmed spectacles. Perhaps somebody might remember him or add other details about the company that supplied the budding theatricals

THE Cambridgeshire Collection collects Cambridgeshire. We do not collect Norfolk or Suffolk, Essex or Huntingdonshire.

By concentrating on one small county we can try to provide an in-depth coverage of both past and present topics.

Thus in recent days we have acquired not only the Inspector's report on the Cambridge City Plan but also consultants reports promoting a large new shopping development off King's Hedges Road which may or may not accord with its recommendations.

But recently too we have been sent publications outside our geo-graphical area which can put Cambridgeshire stories into context.

One is a most interest-ing account of the development of King's Lynn throughout the Victorian period which was prompted by the discovery of letters by Sarah Mace, a village midwife's widow who came to spend her retirement years in the town.

It was a period of considerable develop-ment, grand new build-ings transforming the townscape as Sarah reported to her children, "All New Conduit Street is coming down where the old Post Office used to be, 8 houses coming down on High Bridge They are pulling the fleet right away from the old Custom House out King Street, and the new docks are going to be at Fisher End. All them houses are pulled down opposite the Ethemen (the Athenaeum)..."

The text gives the background - New Conduit Street marked the line of an open sewer which flowed under the High bridge surmounted by venerable houses like a miniature Old London Bridge.

The docks were being moved as part of a massive project to improve the trading position of the town, and at the same time efforts were being made to construct a railway to link King's Lynn to Cambridge and the rest of the world - which enticed Sarah's children away to seek their fortunes elsewhere.

The Athenaeum provided a concert hall and housed a Library of 5,000 volumes, principally for the working classes which opened in 1854 just a year before the Cambridge Free Library started to collect the local books we still treasure.

Meanwhile in St Ives another Victorian benefactor was establishing a collection and that Norris Museum has material for a newly revised history of Huntingdonshire.

It covers the whole county from earliest times to the present featuring Nicholas Ferrar (after whom a Cambridge church is named), St Ives fair - a rival to the great Stourbridge Fair held on the common off Newmarket Road and, of course, the one-time Cambridge MP Oliver Cromwell whose successor as supreme national politician, John Major, has contributed the foreword.

The last words however relate to the demise of Huntingdonshire as a separate administrative area, an issue now being hotly debated once more - as another of our recent accessions, the County Council's submission to the Local Government Commissioners testifies.

It has been one of those weeks when pictures have been dominant. It started with an enquiry for biographical information on Mary C Greene of Harston. I knew a little for some of her paintings of Cambridge backstreets are already in our stock or displayed at the Folk Museum.

Mary and her brother Graham were well-known characters between the wars; she was deaf and could only see with one eye whilst her brother was blind. This did not deter them walking the footpaths around their Harston home or taking the bus to Drummer Street. If Mary made the journey alone she would watch the passengers, mostly mothers with children, and then give a detailed report to Sir Graham - formerly Parliamentary Secretary to the Admiralty - on her return home. Perhaps she described the scene to her nephew, the novelist Graham Greene.

Her housekeeper wrote a memoir in 1974 recalling Mary's early art training in Paris in 1885, her membership of the Cambridge Drawing Society and how she taught painting at the beginning of the century. But it was whilst at Harston that she was most prolific. She would paint aided by the slightest sketches and what she called a "photographic" memory, absorbed with her paints and turps from breakfast to lunch.

But why should there be a revival of interest in her now, over 40 years after her death. The answer is that several of her pictures have now come on the market and are due to be sold by Cheffins Grain & Comings on 14th September..

I was given the chance of a preview and climbed the stairs of the storeroom, baking in the hot afternoon sun. There amongst numerous paintings were a number by Mary. Some depict her beloved Harston including a threshing scene painted in 1921, the Swan Inn and a fine view of Harston House in 1904 when the Greene's entertained Mrs Sarah Smith, owner of the Old Vicarage, Grantchester which provides the subject for another painting.

Three scenes depict Cambridge: a view of Coe Fen which was an area of particular pleasure to the artist who fought Council plans to transform the essentially rural area with its grass, willows, poplars and meandering streams which she painted. A second captures the corner of Peas Hill and the Bell Inn before the great rebuilding of the mid 1930s which swept away the old shops for the new Guildhall.

For me however the third is the most interesting. It is a view of Drummer Street bus station painted between 1942 and 1944 whilst Mary was waiting for the red omnibus which would carry her back to her Harston home.

We have taken photographic copies and placed small bids for some of the canvasses, now we wait to see whether we are successful in adding to our collection of the work of one of the most prolific local artists

Memory of this week must be sewage and the day spent trying to make slides to tell its story.

When Cambridge was a small trading town, before the arrival of the clerks and their learning in the 1200s, King John ordered the construction of a defence fortification. With the river Cam already guarding the northern and western approaches a ditch was dug around the other two sides from the river quite near Magdalene bridge and running down the present Hobson Street, across the current Lion Yard and back to the Cam.

Soon however the King's Ditch became the depository for rubbish of all kinds. It was a handy place too to empty cesspits and the resultant ant stench can be imagined. Indeed in 1393 King Richard II empowered the University Chancellor to take steps to reform certain gutters which were "causing the air to be corrupted and many masters, scholars and others passing through the streets fell sick thereof"

As the town expanded so did the problem and even Queen Victoria is said to have noticed the raw sewage flowing down the filthy River Cam – each of the riverside colleges discharging its privies directly into the water. By the 1860s the Town Council was talking about remedying the situation. Report after report after report was produced, discussed and rejected with one surveyor complaining of uninformed criticism of his proposals from certain members of the Committee. There was more criticism when the agreed scheme finally got under way, and when in 1897 it seemed not to be working Cambridge Ratepayers revolted and rejected proposals for a new Guildhall until the sewers were efficient.

Even when the sewage was running through the underground channels to the new steam pumping station at Riverside there were still problems. In 1916 engineers were experimenting with the mechanism when a massive explosion cracked internal walls and sent sewage gushing into the river

It was not all gloom however for people commented that, thanks to the bad workmanship when the pipes were laid the formerly waterlogged soil had dried out transforming Cambridge from a "damp., moist., misty rheumatically place into a dry and healthy spot". Even so it could not cope with sudden thunderstorms such as that of July 1950 when houses and shops were inundated with both surface and foul water.

All of this and much more will be explored at the Centenary meeting of the Chartered Institution of Water and Environmental Management at Girton college on 26th September. Talks on both sewage and on land drainage will be given by experts, and illustrated by slides (if my film comes out!). The meeting is open to all and starts at 7.30.

Did Hereward the Wake actually exist? If so who was he and what were the crimes he committed which led to his expulsion from England?

What prompted his return, why did he become leader of the resistance to William the Conqueror and how did he defend the Island of Ely against the Nor-man's advances. Following his betrayal by the Monks who showed the Conqueror the secret passageway through the fens what happened to Hereward? Did he survive to make his peace with William and if so where is he buried? Assuming he existed in the first place.

It all happened a very long time ago and there are few sources which can be drawn upon. Those documents which do exist are written in a language foreign to our own - we may need to rely on other people's translations. Victor Head attempts to answer the questions and to put the story of the fenland hero into the context of the period, identifying places which feature in the action and concluding that Hereward was indeed a worthy hero of resistance against oppression.

The hero of Marshall Jevons new mystery did really exist, though not at the time he records, even though the author does not. The pen name is one adopted by two American economics professors who spent some time in Cambridge. While here they took a trip on a chauffeur punt and were impressed with the young man who guided them along the Backs and could converse as knowledgeably on macro-economics as on the wonder of the colleges. So they feature him in "A deadly inheritance" which is set in the Cambridge of the mid-1960s (although chauffeur-driven punts did not start until 1975).

The story revolves around Balliol Croft, the former home of economist Alfred Marshall which - in the story - is hoped to be converted into an institute for the study of free enterprise. Many other locations will be familiar: St John's College, Lensfield and Victoria Roads and Grantchester, -though 'Bishop's College' where various murders take place is (probably) fictitious. They are investigated by Cambridge police Lieutenant Forbush (well, the authors are American) and suspicion falls on the undergraduate punter (despite his skill which prevented yet another death).

With its mixture of real people and places among the thinly disguised and invented the tale is pleasant enough. But there is a real mystery. The authors wish to present a copy of the book to the punter who impressed them, but he has moved on. If anybody can help track down the real Steve Pipes, who used to lodge at Grantchester would they please get in touch with the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library.

IT was, I told a lady, one of those days when we felt like doing things.

It started on the Monday when the Serjeant at Mace came into the Library seeking appropriate music to be played in the Guildhall when the City was honouring its Far East Prisoners of War.

Some may have felt the forgotten heroes as they limped home at the end of the war when all the celebration were over but the Cambridgeshire Regiment had been awarded the Freedom of the Borough in 1946 and now the City was once more saluting them.

The Cambridgeshire Collection has been staging a wartime display for some time now, why not we suggested take it to the Guildhall for the occasion. So on Tuesday morning my colleague transported it across and began re-erecting it.

Coffee break is the time to sort the post and amongst the envelopes there was a parcel. When unpacked it was found to contain three banners produced to celebrate Victory which had been last displayed in May 1945. They were sent to us by a group we had been assisting earlier in the year. These were rushed across to the Guildhall and once more proclaimed their message.

Meanwhile the ordinary business of the morning continued - readers came and asked questions, some we answered, some we referred elsewhere.

One of the displays in the Collection features photos by Briscoe Snelson of pre-war river scenes. These will shortly be published, but how should the book be launched? Inspiration struck, ideas canvassed and, should it all go to plan, the result will be seen in a week or two. So with the Guildhall display, the Victory flags and the book launch all sorted before lunch-time it was going well. Then came the next enquirer.

She had come up to Cambridge from the South coast intent on discovering something of the presentation of the Freedom of the Borough - not to the Cambridgeshire regiment - but to the American 8th Army Air Force.

We quickly turned up the programme for the occasion and the newspaper reports for 2nd August 1945 which described the scene on Market Hill, decked with flags and banners (exactly the banners we had received that morning!). The front page had a picture which was of particular relevance for as well as American forces there were a contingent of RAF and the WAAF - and somewhere among the girls in uniform right at the front of the parade was our reader.

A quick call to the Mayor's office was all that was needed to secure for her an invitation back to the Guildhall to participate in that afternoon's reception with the other Freemen of the borough of 50 years ago.

As I said it was one of those days when we felt like doing things!

TWO poets and a multi-married African chief from Ludlow have come together on our new accessions shelves.

The poets are Rupert Brooke and A E Housman, almost contemporaries in Cambridge. The former had come up to King's College in 1906, leaving after three years to lodge at The Orchard, Grantchester - and the rest is history. In 1912 when sitting in a Berlin cafe he reminisced about his Cambridgeshire days, extolling the beauties of Grantchester, attacking the mean and dirty Ditton girls, black and fierce Roystonians, unfriendly Overians and the nameless crimes of Coton.

The meaning of it all has been analysed in various books and now in a new video by Denis Cheason which follows the poet to the places he mentions, revealing their charms but commenting also on some of the changes over the intervening years.

Next year will see celebrations for the centenary of the publication of 'A Shropshire Lad', a collection of poems dealing with the themes of love, death and war against a background of the flow of life and the seasons in the fields and woodlands of the English countryside. In anticipation of the event Robin Shaw has produced a guide to places associated with the poet embracing Bromsgrove, London, Oxford and Cambridge where Housman arrived as Kennedy professor of Latin in 1911 and stayed until his death in 1936.

Housman's first lodgings were in Panton Street. He died in the Evelyn Nursing Home but most of his time was in Whewell's Court, Trinity College, whose Wren Library possesses the autographed manuscript of the poem celebrating its centenary.

One of those responsible for organising the celebrations is an African chief, James Moxon, who when not attending to his seven wives in his adopted tribe in Ghana devotes time to his family ancestry.

We met at the annual meeting of the Moxon Society, held this year at St John's college when our brief was to introduce them to the wonders of Chatteris, Lt Downham and Ely. The latest issue of the Moxon Magazine tells how the family arrived in fenland with the Dutch drainers, certainly one William Moxon married a Downham widow, Mary Page in 1638 and the name had previously flourished in Thorne, Yorkshire where Cornelius Vermuyden had been employed.

Offspring from that marriage found partners in the neighbouring parishes of Witchford, Haddenham and Prickwillow from where in 1900 Henry Moxon described how on rough winter's nights the parson would fight his way on horseback through heavy snow down long droves lined with deep rush-covered ditches, attired in oilskins, sou'wester and thick boots to visit a dying parishioner in some isolated cottage.

One more name to be entered into the burial registers, one more place to be sought by family historians in years to come.

A recent letter to the Cambridge Evening News criticised the design of buildings along Newmarket Road. By contrast the correspondent to the Cambridge Chronicle of January 8th 1853 was concerned with the moral quality of life in this part of Cambridge an area characterised by habitations of cruelty and immorality.

Guided by a member of the local constabulary the reporter explored the "dark entries tortuous windings, trap doors and zig zag passages" which provided the "focus of villainy, the receptacle of dishonest spoil, the refuge of the petty thief and the full developed scoundrel" of the Barnwell area

In Bradmore Lane the very railings were patched with rusty tea-trays, whilst Short Street was a horrid place of broken windows, dissipated women, cesspools, pigs-houses and dung-heaps. In New Street a bone manufactory added to the miseries and disease of the place in summer time - indeed the correspondent was glad to visit in the cold of winter and in the brightness of midday let the sun be cloudy and how terrible must the scenery be.

In one area however a field of winter wheat flourished quite next to the gravel pits. It was here that one Walls had been murdered some sixteen years earlier. The remains had been discovered by an old woman – she was fetching a pail of water one night and her bucket knocked against his head. How many, one wonders., had drunk of that water before her discovery!

The Victorian newspaper article goes on to suggest ways of remedying the worst excesses of the area, perhaps by employing men to watch the movement of the inhabitants. But it does concede that even here there were opulent, moral and religious inhabitants

There were also hard workers. For it was this area of Cambridge which produced the bricks which constructed the many new streets that were growing in profusion to provide homes for those seeking to make a life for themselves away from the poverty of the rural villages.

One such firm was Walls and Company, established about 1822 and which continued to trade until 1968.

In about 1887 they produced a print of their works with its proximity to the railway line and in the background the Barnwell bridge with the Leper chapel just visible to one side and sundry houses peeping from trees on the other. We have been allowed to make a copy for the Collection and it proved just the right token to mark the 10th anniversary of the flourishing Barnwell and Fen Ditton Local History Society, whose members may in turn research more of the story of this most important yet perhaps unappreciated area of Cambridge

THROUGH THE: MODERN MIRACLE OF "NEWS" TECHNOLOGY MIKE PETTY WAS RECENTLY TRANSPORTED BACK TO CAMBRIDGE MARKET HILL 130 YEARS AGO. IN THE FIRST OF A SERIES OF ARTICLES HE REFLECTS ON THE ISSUES OF THE PERIOD

It must have been about 1865 that the photograph was taken - I remember standing on Cambridge Market Hill, just beside the Guildhall, watching the man who was standing there in Petty Cury with his funny box on a tripod and the black cloth over his head.

I think he said his name was Arthur Nicholls and he had moved his photographic studio to Post Office Terrace because of all the dust and noise from the building work near his old studio off St. John's street. If it was not bad enough to have the demolition of All Saints church and the building of that massive chapel at St John's college, now there's talk of a massive new block by Alfred Waterhouse in place of the old houses next to the Senate House. If it carries on at this rate there'll be nothing left of old Cambridge soon

Mind you I know the Council had to do something after the great fire of 1849 burnt down the shops that used to stand between me and the church - though Cambridge council being what it is they did take a long while to make up their minds - and even longer to do something! When they finally did knock the rest of the buildings down to give this massive Market Square they had all that fuss about what to put in the middle - they thought the old Hobson's Conduit on the corner of the Market was too old fashioned and would have a grand new fountain. That was nearly 10 years ago now.

The soldier-lad had been out at the Crimean War - he was telling me all about the Charge of the Light Brigade and all the casualties he'd seen. He'd been wounded himself he said, and had it not been from that Florence Nightingale - the lady with the lamp he called her - well he'd not have recovered.

Mind you he was lodging in Falcon Yard - just down Petty Cury near the Lion Hotel - and the conditions there he says are nearly as bad. Dozens of families are crammed into dark and decaying rooms, just one or two privies for the lot of them and all the rubbish tossed out of the back windows into a reeking heap in the Lion yard.

We were saying that it's no wonder that the Prince Albert died of fever: he might have been Chancellor of the University but that didn't make him immune from infection - what with all the sewage floating down the Cam what comes straight out of the colleges. We reckon that might be why Bertie - sorry The Prince of Wales - was based out at Madingley Hall when he was studying - if that's what they call it. You should hear some of the stories they tell about his goings on. Now there's some talk about erecting a statue to Prince Albert, though whether it would go in the Senate House or at the Fitzwilliam Museum only time will tell.

SEPARATE NOTE

The statue was finally unveiled in the Fitzwilliam Museum in 1878 — the sculptor had been busy with the Albert Memorial in Hyde Park. The Prince of Wales, later to be crowned King Edward VII performed the ceremony. In 1956 it was moved to the grounds of Madingley Hall where it stands beside a lake

THROUGH THE MODERN MIRACLE OF "NEWS" TECHNOLOGY MIKE PETTY WAS RECENTLY TRANSPORTED BACK TO CAMBRIDGE MARKET HILL 130 YEARS AGO, IN THE SECOND OF A SERIES OF ARTICLES HE REFLECTS ON THE ISSUES OF THE PERIOD REFLECTIONS ON 1865

Arthur Nicholls had asked everybody to stand very still so he could get a good picture. We men did as he asked but the old woman would not - she said she had other things to do than stand around on street corners - poor Arthur had a devil of a job in the darkroom working on his negative to make her skirt look anyhow Mind you when she got talking she would stop for hours. I think she said she was one of the bedders at the colleges: she was old enough and ugly enough that's for sure — (the University was always very careful to make sure of that so as not to put temptation in the way of their students). Always dashing out for this and that - and with a basket full of the left-overs from the undergraduate's tables. She was not very keen on the shops in the centre though - saying how Petty Cury was full of wine merchants and hatters, robe-makers, hosiers, bootmakers and tobacconists - not like Fitzroy Street with its greengrocers, butchers, hardware dealers and lots of general shops. There were useful people too like the chimney sweep, pram-maker and the chemists.

At the chemists she would always get some of that Laudanum for her sister out in the fens, Burwell way, and would send it out to her on the carrier's cart. She said these tablets were essential to fight all the ague and rheumaticky pain they got out there and how as that was very useful when the poppies weren't around. Women in the fens would mix a little poppy-head tea for their youngsters when they wanted them to be quiet - it was amazing how that little bit of opium did the trick .

Mind you the older children were very good workers and the gang-master would always find work for them out in the fields. Some people thought it was a sin to see the youngsters lining up in the street in the very early morning to be ready to walk out to some distant fields to pick twitch or do other jobs But they should realise that the money they made came in very handy, even if the girls in particular were worn out at the end of the week. One mother had even sent her very youngest kid - six year old. She worked from early morning to late in the afternoon but were that tired she had to be carried home, and never went no more.

Children in the towns could find other work - delivery boys were always wanted, though shopkeepers soon got rid of them when they got too old. Better that than be a chimney-sweep boy. One rich lady had been entertaining her upper-crust friends when the chimney caught fire and the sweep man had made the lad climb up the inside of the chimney to clear it out - they often did that and would sometimes pour a pail or two of water down from the top to cool them if they got too hot. The smaller boys were particularly useful cos they could get through smaller chimneys and were also put down into the privies to find rings or things that had dropped down there - that made them stink worse than any fen mud!

IN THIS FINAL REFLECTIONS SPECIAL MIKE PETTY RETURNS TO THE CAMBRIDGE MARKET HILL OF 1865 AND THE ISSUES OF THE DAY

Those standing just outside the Guildhall in the closing months of 1865 had plenty to reflect about. The opening up of trade now that the last turnpike gate - that, at Castle End - had been removed. Now however the Council were imposing restrictions on traction engines, limiting the time they could come into the town, making a man with a red flag walk in front of them and cutting their speed - mind you some said it was right because of the damage they did to the streets - the weight of them had caused the sewer in Sidney Street to collapse and Lilley's horse fell down the hole!

The council's had other things on their mind with proposals to build a new Corn Exchange, though plans by Rowe for a building in Peas Hill stretching down Wheeler Street and including offices for the Town Clerk were causing disagreement - as was the site for a statue to Jonas Webb, the sheep breeder - some said it should be on the new Market Hill whilst others wanted to put it in the new Corn Exchange - if there was to be a new Corn Exchange of course.

It was not helped by the fact that, there were squabbles as to who did what between the two different bodies - the Borough Council and the Cambridge Improvement Commissioners who were supposed to oversee the cleaning, paving and lighting of the town as well as sewage disposal. They were claiming that the River Cam would soon be clean enough for salmon – but what about the reports that the new Water Company were losing one third of their production of water/

Mind you everybody, despite their political feelings were united in their horror at the assassination of President Lincoln in America and at the news of the death of Lord Palmerston who as Prime Minister might have upset Queen Victoria but was; popular with the ordinary people. He had started as a Tory and then switched to the Whigs - but what was politics to the ordinary man in the street.

An election - like the one in July - was an opportunity to earn a pound or two. Mind you it was a bit different this last time because the hustings had been moved off Parker's Piece and erected on Market Hill instead. You still had to go up on to the stage in full view of everybody and make a public declaration as to which of the candidates you wanted to vote for. You did get two votes as there were two MPs for Cambridge but you usually supported the same pair - two Whigs or two Tories. They wrote it all down in a poll book and when the voting was over these were published so that everybody could see who voted for who.

Then just before the election you could expect a visit from a canvasser offering you £5, £10 - some even got more - to vote for their candidate. Even if you didn't have a vote you could get money to carry the party flags, or protect them from the opponent's men — or even just walk the streets at night to make sure people didn't pull down your posters - but don't say too much about it because there was nearly always an Inquiry afterwards and you had to take time off work to answer the Commissioners' questions. Sooner there was a different system the better some said

Ladies who wish to become proficient as cyclists or those who being already past-mistresses of the pastime find themselves in want of new cycles certainly cannot do better in their own interests than look at Ison's establishment and test for themselves the comfort and running qualities of the famous New Chesterton Bicycles".

So reads an advertisement on the back page of Westrope's Year Book for 1911, a copy of which has recently been acquired by the Collection.

Other Cambridge advertisers trumpet the merits of Dale's Pale Ales (awarded three prize medals at the Brewer's exhibition in London 1910), Suttle the Tailor of Fitzroy Street, J.S. Banyard manufacturers of mixture and shags and retailers of cigarettes and fancy goods from East Road. Mr P. Hawkes practitioner of English and American dentistry who travelled out from Hills Road to Cottenham each Tuesday promising painless extractions and a set of teeth from £1.1.0

Many Cottenham traders took the opportunity to secure their place in the Almanack including T., Burgess painter and plumber, Harold Bell practical cabinet maker and upholsterer whilst W Gordon Holdgate's high class mineral waters were well-known for their excellency, pungency and good quality. Though if it was stronger liquid you fancied then the Barley Mow at Histon would supply strong Bailey and Tebbutt ale at 1/8 a gallon or John Walker's whisky at the wholesale price of 4/- a bottle.

Elsewhere harnessmakers, bootmakers, laundries and watchmakers demonstrate that everything could be obtained within the village, though should residents insist on leaving then Arthur Bavidge of Denmark Road runs his bus to Cambridge every Saturday afternoon, returning at 6 p m, for one shilling .

But Westrope's year book was a compendium of local information detailing parish councillors and constables, charities and churches, clubs and societies which catered to the villagers in the area - Histon, Waterbeach, Milton amongst them..

It also recorded a great deal of local history including in 1910 an extract from Thomas Pauley's memorandum book recording that in 1842 after Cottenham inclosure "I was the first one that plowed in Cottenham field and I worked for Edward Ivatt. He drove the horses although he was blind and his son Edward led the harrow horses and he was blind", whilst Baptist Minister John Corbitt's early life in the parish from 1800 is told in an extract from his autobiography - not currently held in the Collection but one which we can now try to locate.

Such is the magic of items such as Westrope's Almanack and I should appreciate the opportunity to copy others which may be hidden away amongst personal papers.

THE flood of small publications continues to be produced presenting difficulties for the buyer since most bookshops need to ask large discounts on the copies they stock and for the most part the producers have priced their items too low to allow for such trade terms.

Although the Cambridge Central Library shop takes a wide range on a sale or return basis there are many books which are only available from village retailers, village societies or from the author themselves.

Three of the latest of such publications cover Melbourn, Barrington and the Gransdens. For Victorian Melbourn Miss McNeice has read the wide range of other parish histories, selected from them and added information not previously recorded to give a glance at the houses and pubs, trades and customs of the village. She includes "Gooding" when on St Thomas' day, 21st December, poor widows went around asking for money or goods preparatory to Christmas. The streets they tramped are still there but the names may have changed. Norgetts Lane was previously known as Morgan Lane and Organ Lane was originally the place where Mr Norgan kept the pound for stray animals.

May Day customs are recalled at Barrington. For many the village is notable for its large green, attractive cottages and the half-timbered Royal Oak public house -once one of seven hostelrys locals could patronise but there is another side - the industrial heritage of the village, the brick and coprolite pits and cement works (now greatly in the news) which clash with the image of old-world thatched cottages.

But as Ray Jude shows these were essential providers of employment for local men when labour was even shorter than today. The terraced houses built by the brick company for its workers provided accommodation and were later supplemented by discarded railway carriages which made good mobile homes for four families while mobile food was supplied from Coote's fish and chip van which operated between 1930 and 1952.

Bakers and butchers feature in the most professionally produced volume issued by the Gransden Society where a most interesting range of pictures, taken by a wealth of local photographers are supplemented by detailed captions. They introduce crazy Betty Cade, a former resident of the Oley Almshouses, who was kept chained up - an object of mingled terror and wonderment to village children, and recount how a lad came to be able to claim that he had sat on the weather-cock on the top of the church. From more recent days come memories of the Queen of Yugoslavia who lived in the village during the second world war, when Wellingtons and Lancasters took off from local fields and village trees were cut down so that lorries carrying bombs could manoeuvre round the corners.

Victorian Melbourn - a passing glance by Miss J McNeice, 6 Dolphin Lane, Melbourn, £3.50 plus postage. Barrington : a tour in old photographs by Raymond & Margaret Jude published by the Barrington Society, c/o 12 Upsheres, Saffron Walden CB113BP. £5.00. WHEN did they move Hobson's Conduit to Huntingdon, scrap the one way system in Ely or sell Chivers Christmas puddings to the Americans in fancy glass basins at $3.53 per dozen?

The answer to the last question is January 1912 and is revealed in a newly acquired copy of Chivers Export catalogue of that date which gives some glimpse of the difficulties to be faced when endeavouring to establish an international market for local produce.

To attract the attention of buyers, the company used the back page to depict colour views of its Histon canning works as it was in 1901 but illustrated its front cover by a most attractive colour view of the village green with contented cows drinking from the brook to the mild consternation of wildfowl and the background dominated by olde-world white-washed thatched cottages - surely appealing to its potential customers in Boston.

How much of the rural scene was accurate and how much artistic licence is something only a local can say, but sometimes the truth can be manipulated.

Certainly the former Head of Ely Kings' School, Hubert Ward, spotted some discrepancies on a painting by Dennis Flanders - choristers never processed down the Gallery in Cathedral robes, no member of staff wore gown and square in 1980 and some of the cars seem to be heading the wrong way up a one-way street - but he felt they did not spoil a good picture.

It is one of 52 colour plates in 'Watercolours in Academe' by the topographical draughtsman who died in 1994.

Amongst others is (inevitably) King's College, though the forecourt and positioning of the famous pillar box are different from today and there is a profusion of academic gowns in this view first produced in 1955.

There are also pictures of Peterhouse, where the caption refers to the memorial to Godfrey Washington at the college whereas other sources place it in St Mary's Church nearby, and Kimbolton School, whose main building is the castle where VIII's first wife Katharine of Aragon died.

As for Hobson's Conduit well that is my mistake. But a photograph in a new pictorial history of Huntingdon does show an edifice very like it being unveiled at Hinchbrooke House in 1889.

It is one of over 170 views taken by local photographers Arthur Maddison, Frederick Hinde and Ernest Whitney some of whose negatives were rescued from an old cellar and are now at Huntingdon county record office. Others reveal much of the unexpected history of the town - the Portholme Aerodrome company which built sea-planes, Sopwith Snipes and Camels during the Great War from works alongside those of Eddison Bell, manufacturers of gramophone records between 1923 and 1930.

Elsewhere Murkett Brothers built motorised tricycles and George Maddox's locally manufactured motor cars carried mourners at his funeral in 1921.

Nor must one overlook the processing works of Messrs Chivers and sons which from 1930 helped meet the demand for that company's products around the world

The donation of an odd issue of a magazine called "Punch in Cambridge" would I thought make an easy subject for an article. How wrong can one be. It was published between 1833 and 1834 as a Whig journal and was soon opposed by "Toby in Cambridge" which supported the Tory cause.

As their titles suggest they endeavoured to amuse and to provide pleasant company for dark winter evenings as well as to enlighten townsfolk on matters of topical interest.

In this latter role they are now very hard for me at least to appreciate. One might enjoy the wit of contemporary political satire and be familiar with current political nicknames (like "Tarzan") but it is entirely a different matter when trying to understand the politics of 160 years ago when Earl Grey, Viscount Melbourne, Robert Peel and Viscount Melbourne were Prime Ministers.

Locally there were various contentious issues. The Reform Act enfranchised many more voters and the Corporation Commissioners were investigating corruption in local government. Indeed The Times slated the council for "shameless profligacy and inveterate dishonesty. Just 158 freemen (only 118 of whom lived in Cambridge) controlled the affairs of 20,000 people. They obtained corporation property with one Alderman paying L40 for two acres of land in Hills Road and then selling it next year for L400. In the previous 14 years they had spent just L480 for public purposes and L1,3000 on dinners. The University was debating changes in their rules which might allow dissenters to attend, Downing college was petitioning against paying rates and a mob attacked the Anatomical Theatre after a pauper's body was mistakenly supplied for dissection. The Riot Act was read and order was finally restored after considerable damage had been done to the building and its contents.

In a rare example of co operation the University and Town combined to establish a Board of Health to combat the feared spread of cholera. Punch in Cambridge took up the subject on in its first issue, 7th February 1832 claiming that the Corporation hoped to use the disease to direct attention from Reform. They also comment on a new fashion of duelling reporting that two students at Berlin rather than resorting to pistols or swords they both went up to a patient attacked with cholera and kissed him. Both apparently survived.

Such happenings are recorded in Charles Henry Cooper's "Annals of Cambridge" reported in the columns of the local newspapers Cambridge Independent Press and the Cambridge

Chronicle but it takes "Toby" to leak the news that a proposed Tax surcharge on each of the new voters had been delayed until after the Borough Elections perhaps some things do not change

IN WINTER the black fenland soil turns white with frost and the dark, cold fenland waters turn white with swans.

Like bulky ghosts thousands of Whooper and Bewick swans arrive from even more Arctic climes of Siberia or Iceland - a mere 500 miles away over inhospitable seas which need to be crossed in a single flight.

The man-made expanses of Washes at Welney become a resting place for this remarkable assemblage of wildfowl and people flock in their hundreds to view them and to witness the remarkable ritual when at night, under the glow of floodlights, these majestic birds taken sustenance from the keeper's wheelbarrow, the corn cast across the water. Yet hidden beyond the high river banks this wonderful sight is so easily missed -it needs to be sought out to be appreciated. The same applies to an excellent photographic record of Black fens, white swans published from Meldreth in 1994 but only noticed by me in a St Ives bookshop recently.

Alongside it on the shelves was a small book of poetry, privately published in Hemingford Grey by Toni Watson. It is a retelling in verse of several of the tales from the Fens recounted by W.H. Barrett and including his reference to the five swans who arrived in the skies above Littleport on June 28, 1816 at precisely the time when five local bodies were twitching convulsively on the gallows at Ely, executed for their part in the protest at the harshness of fenland life which has been immortalised in the phrase "Littleport Riots."

Perhaps if they had possessed a single grey goose quill their lives might not have been forfeit - for there was a fenland tradition that such a token, when accompanied by the secret password, would ensure that a true fenman must do anything to aid its holder.

Oliver Cromwell is said to have presented one to each of the local men who had rallied to his cause - an undying token of his support for them. Yet Cromwell himself broke the fenland code when he refused to honour a plea for assistance from King Charles I on the eve of his execution.

The King had received the slit grey goose quill after he had spared the life of a fenman condemned to hang - the criminal himself was prepared to die but the hangman's rope would also mean the death of the family who depended on him - the family for whom he had stolen a sheep.

Others found that a partridge or hare might mean the difference between a full belly or starvation and John Bell includes one such case in his second anthology of Cambridgeshire crimes.

In 1833 a gamekeeper to the Earl of Hardwick was on patrol in Wimpole wood when he heard a gunshot. He confronted two poachers both of whom lifted their shotguns and fired at him from a distance of nine feet.

Remarkably he escaped death and, thanks to clever detection, his assailants were later hanged at Cambridge castle – without benefit of a single goose quill.

Black fens, white swans by Lindley Good is published by Wigeon Publications, 21 North End, Meldreth. The grey goose quill and other ballads of the Fens is by Toni Watson of Hemingford Grey at £7.95

Reflections 1996 01 03

Just occasionally I start to catch up with some of the items which have come in during previous weeks and months, though the reports accessioned this week may well take another two or three months before they finally find their way into our catalogues

On the face of it the official report of debates in the House of Commons on 23rd March 1937 may not be compulsive reading, especially when the main business of the day was the Consolidated Fund (no.2) Bill. Speakers included the Honorable Members for Wakefield, Leominster and Carnarvon a certain Lloyd George. But the MPs for the Isle of Ely, James de Rothschild, and Cambridgeshire (Captain Briscoe) were well to the fore.

The issue for debate however was one of urgent and definite national importance one of the heroic struggles of peace time which found men and women labouring by day and night with the aid of flickering oil lamps, under conditions of the last Great War, in mud and slime, with water up to the knees in order to defend their own homes. People were trapped in isolated cottages surrounded by water, children not able to go to school for six months and households marooned and unable to provide themselves even with food and the necessities of life. Yes it was the issue of fen drainage once more.

James de Rothschild was appreciative of the opinions of his colleagues, though found it hard to reconcile some of what was being reported in the National papers with the situation he knew it at first hand for example he had read how Mepal had been evacuated on Tuesday night, but knew for a fact that there had been a successful Liberal Party meeting on the Friday and people would hardly have returned to a war zone for such an event. However large areas had been lost to cultivation including Cawdle Fen between Ely and Lt Thetford where one farmer had 74 acres under water last year, it had flooded again this year and was now under water again.

Captain Briscoe speaking for his Cambridgeshire constituents singled out the 8,000 acres around Bottisham and Swaffham Prior. It had flooded in 1911, 1919, 1928 and now 1937. Part of the problem was inadequate pumping equipment and the only remedy had to be more expenditure at Denver Sluice.

Another brave MP, had himself paid a visit to the area and seen just how unpleasant it could be to live in a house within a few yards of an enormously high bank brim full of menacing water, knowing full well that if the bank were to give way their homes would be gone and their livelihood also. The blame, as always, lay on the Government be it Tory Government, Liberal Government or a combination of both.... On and on the debate ranged until it was time to turn to other topics the National Health Insurance Act (amendment) Bill, the Electricity (Supply) Act special order relating to Dover and then, at just before 10pm the most important debate of all that the House should adjourn.

The day before Christmas Eve two people struggled into the Cambridgeshire Collection bearing gifts hidden in three very heavy carrier bags. The day after Boxing Day another such parcel was delivered to our door at home. For some people the opportunity of a few days break, especially at this time of year, gives an excuse for a good clear out of paper to make way for the mass likely to arrive as the new year progresses, adding to the duplicate stock available for others to borrow from the Collection.

For much of the content of the four carrier bags we already held in profusion. Structure Plan and town planning reports are usually delivered to us when just produced, giving people the chance to consult and read what is being proposed – they are essential for some, irrelevant to others. Thus the contents of the first carriers related to plans for the now developed Grafton Centre whilst it was still known as the Kite Area, whilst the second was concerned with the new village known as Westmere by the planners, Wetmere by the protestors. This included an Environmental statement, part of the package of plans and papers finally revealed to our village by the developers at a display in the Parish Hall where smartly suited executives with their mobile phones kept a watchful eye on the protesting yokels whose opposition was to be anticipated but whose eventual victory inconceivable.

Strangely at the end of the evening one of these bulky reports had gone missing – the guards had virtually frisked everybody who left to ensure their information remained confidential until they chose to make it available – always just before Christmas – year after year we knew the festive season was approaching when a new plan was produced days before everybody knocked off for their turkey and puddings and an immediate response required. Quite how the elusive report came to get tucked away behind the curtains at the back of the hall is a mystery not yet formally solved, but certainly the one now before me seems to have the same watermarks from the condensation on the windowsill|

There have been many plans and proposals over the last century or so – a new road to replace Emmanuel Street in 1901 which was dropped after public opposition – but which led to the Borough Council building an underpass to link the two parts of Emmanuel College split by the existing road. In 1912 there were plans for a new road from Mill Pool to Coe Fen through the disused Kings and Bishops Mills building which were finally demolished in 1927.

In 1932 Magdalene College proposals to replace the old shops and houses opposite its gates to provide a wide new roadway into the centre of town were dropped but in 1949 that area was once more in the headlines, the County wanting to close the street whilst the Borough wanted it widened with a bigger and better bridge. The discussions continue to take place, old ideas being revived and old objections rethought. Who knows how the papers just received will be reworked in the years to come Papworth St Agnes is a small settlement buried within south Cambridgeshire, the road down into the valley leads to nowhere else and a few years ago led only to a church, bakehouse a few farms and some tumbled down cottages. Many of the cottages have now disappeared and in their stead have arisen modern new dwellings.

When Dora Tack arrived there in 1942 as an escapee from from Brixton she found herself in a world far removed from the metropolis. When she fell in love with a local farm labourer she needed to register the impending marriage with a proper address, yet neither streets nor houses had names. So she had recorded it as "near the church" Papworth St Agnes – though every cottage could equally claim that distinction. However it satisfied the registrar.

Having already recorded her own experiences in "From bombs to buckets" Dora has now encouraged the other residents to share their recollections of the settlement as it was in 1942 to provide a fascinating account of the community and houses from that period.

All the buildings are there, from the Manor House with its priest hole entered from the panelling high in the landing from which a rope ladder led down into the secret chamber to cottages where rats rustled in the thatch but nobody bothered as long as they did not come down into the house itself.

The Reading Room had been erected so that men of the village could have somewhere to meet in winter evenings the Squire having ruled against a pub. It was understood that there should be no alcohol on the premises but one night the Rector arrived to find a beer bottle though it was explained that it contained vinegar for the fish and chips then being consumed. As the building stood empty and unused people asked whether it might be converted into living accommodation and the tales of its occupants are fully recorded together with the Tilley reading lamp that was brought in to replace the dull yellow glow of the oil lamps.

Dora does not shrink from recording the other everyday details of life before mains water and flushing toilets, recalling the "Coffee shop" the family name for the brick built slated roof lavatory at the back of the cottage which lacked windows but had holes cut in the door. Inside were two wooden seats, one adult size the other lower and smaller for children. The buckets were emptied every Saturday, being removed via a hinged door at the back of the building which could be draughty when the loo was actually in use|

There were bats in bedrooms and fleas in the beds best caught and dropped in the po underneath but all the while there was a war to be fought with Home Guard hut, Italian prisoners of war and even German air raids to contend with and all are recorded in a most readable manner.

From time to time people come into the Cambridgeshire Collection and go through our waste paper box. Our photocopier is quite adequate and most people use it happily enough but from time to time something goes wrong the copy is too dark or has not quite got the section needed so the duff copies go into a box so that others can use them as scrap paper.

So what does end up in that box and how much a reflection is it of what people are actually using for their research. To find out I have pulled out a handful of paper and will now analyse it just as it comes.

First out comes a super enlarged picture of the construction of the new Cambridge regional college, next a panorama of the most established centre of learning, looking across the centre of town with the Castle Hill on one side and Downing on the other. This is a particularly attractive view looking down the river from Jesus Lock and showing Magdalene and St John's college bridges spanning the Cam drawn about 110 years ago.

A map of St Matthew's parish showing the area bounded by Mill Road, East Road and the railway line about 1860 which accompanies a dissertation for an MA degree at Anglia on the theme of "Bedders and brewers : women of St Matthews, work and images 1850 1900" has obviously been found useful for somebody whilst alongside it is a part of a much more modern map of the area around Ferry Burrows, Pickle Fen, Old Halves and Stocking Drove farm just outside Chatteris.

Over 2,000 people packed Ely Cathedral for the funeral of the Bishop of Ely, Dr White Thomson, who had been appointed in 1924 and seems to have passed away at the end of 1933, according to clues on the extract made from a microfilm copy of the Cambridge Independent Press. By pure coincidence the next item is also from a newspaper, being a cutting from a report of a Parish Council meeting in one of the local villages, September 1995. We have taken such cuttings files on 800 places and topics since 1958.

Yet another newspaper extract : this time the front page of the Cambridge Daily News for 13th November 1964. Which of the stories attracted our user the squabble in the Labour Party, the distribution of food at a camp in the Congo, was it the report that London's Christmas shoppers who go by car would find it even tougher that year with Mr Marples announcing a reduction in the number of special car parks or the protest on Russian nuclear tests.

More maps Wimpole park about 1886, more cuttings, an enlargement of a picture of a horse (head missed off so that's why it was done again), engravings of the founders of Pambroke and Queens' college and the construction of air raid trenches at the Cambridge High School, 1939 no wonder people find it interesting enough to plunder them|

Reflections by Mike Petty, 7th February 1996

For the last several months I have become particularly acquainted with the visiting times at Addenbrooke's Hospital. But now the need for a few days away but nearby seemed irresistible.

There were just a few commitments to honour. A Thursday afternoon talk to Histon junior school about Victorian times would be over by 3.30 except for the telephone call from the Radio Station wanting somebody to talk about the newly discovered air raid shelter at Parkside school. This proved a useful introduction to the Friday morning presentation at RAF Lakenheath about Cambridge at war when American troops flocked to the town for rest and recuperation.

Then back for the daily Visit before joining the traffic en route to Bury and taking to the black back roads of Suffolk. The Grange Hotel Thurston stands amongst trees down a winding, lonely drive. We had discovered it in daylight or might never have found our way. Finally the house loomed ghostly and dark with just the thinnest glimmer of light around the heavy entrance door surely the Histon kids would have appreciated just what life was like for their ancestors in the days before electricity Inside a fire sparkled in the grate, the Grandfather clock ticked and a friendly (but almost Victorian|) receptionist informed us we would be the only guests. When booking we had asked about the prospect of extending our two night break, to be told that nobody stayed a third night ... Offered a choice of rooms we selected the bridal suite brass bedstead, new furniture and massive windows that overlooked the surrounding gardens and trees. We filled the kettle and scanned the line of books to discover one particularly rare title my "Cambridge in pictures 1888 1988" unsigned by the author (and surely I had defaced every one|)

The prospect of a lonely evening vanished as the hotel filled for a dinner dance on behalf of the local hospice, though the chef proprietor could still produce food which would grace the table at Claridges (where he had trained before lecturing on his craft in Germany and Canada). On the second evening the dining room with its Adam fireplace was filled and a mystery resolved it was the size of the portions which discouraged an extended stay.

Afterwards we wondered just what it was trying to gain entry to the bar from the floodlit garden. Apparently it was a deer and not the ghost which some say haunts one of the rooms, a reflection of the time when the building had served as an Anglo American club after the war.

Previously it had been a private home built for an Archdeacon of Ely about 100 years ago. Back at work I tracked him down Rev Frank Robert Chapman who in 1906 had published a now scarce work on "The Sacrist Rolls of Ely Cathedral". I have his book in the Collection, just as his old house holds one of mine but no longer quite so rare as it was.

When people choose to move house there are a number of considerations. Prospective locations need to be assessed having due consideration for features such as accessibility, type of property available quaint thatched cottage with an earth floor and single outside tap or stately mansion; are there roses around the door or robins on the bird table

For those experiencing such predicaments a number of newly received items might give guidance. From Thriplow has come a village guide and history emphasizing that although the motorway is only a mile away it is out of sight and out of earshot, that mains sewage has now been installed and that it has retained the best of its legacies from the past. Colour photographs capture its charm, especially in springtime when its daffodil weekend attract visitors from near and far.

Visitors flock too to a garden of a thatched cottage nestling in the bend of a river with an early Tudor Guild Hall and a Norman Church for neighbours. Here an American novice has constructed his version of an English country garden and has described the experience in a booklet published in America back in 1987 and finally arriving in the Collection last week. "Gardening for fun in England" is illustrated with sketches of sherry with the Vicar, flower shows, rabbits and moles and just enough clues to indicate that this rural idyll is based in Linton where the arrival of a blackbird or the birth of thrushes is a major event.

Haddenham folk are somewhat more systematic in their recording of ornithological data and its Conservation Society have published an illustrated study listing the Black Tailed Godwits, Green Sandpipers, Redshanks and Hoopoes and other visitors that have been glimpsed by its human residents.

But wherever one chooses to live there is another problems : that of getting your furniture there. For nearly 100 years one of the firms that would have eased that difficulty was George Bolton. Established in the early days of the railways its wagons could be loaded on goods trucks. Sized between 12 and 18 feet in length and about 7 foot high they would be tested against the height of the tunnels on the route. They were constructed with a well in the floor into which crockery could be packed and covered over before heavier items were positioned on top of it.

Removals were one thing, the storage of furniture another and warehouses were built in Tenison & Glisson Road. Initially there was plenty of space and one of the floors was hired out for roller skating, but soon the buildings would be packed, each family's possessions kept separated and secure inside hessian shrouds, awaiting the day then they would be reassembled as part of somebody's life.

Reflections by Mike Petty 21st February 1996

It was a perfectly reasonable request for a our reader to make : he wanted a catalogue of the Cambridgeshire Collection that could be taken away.

We have a wide range of different catalogues of books, illustrations, maps, handbills, videos together with a number of indexes to newspapers, local biography, portraits taken by Ramsey & Muspratt and files of various sorts all of which are listed in our Guide to catalogues.

Several of these catalogues can indeed be obtained for use outside the library since those covering books, illustrations and our news index have been microfilmed at various times whilst the more recent book accession are recorded on computer disks a copy of which are filed at the County Record Office. The duplicate stock we hold which can be borrowed for reading at home is now nearly all included on the Cambook computers held in many of the county's libraries

The newly published material we acquire is listed in three separate publications, including Conduit, the newsletter of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society and "East Anglian Bibliography" where they join similar titles notified by my colleagues throughout the rest of Cambridgeshire, Norfolk and Suffolk.

But what was needed was just a printed list of the books held. Our colleagues in the former Cambridgeshire and Isle of Ely County Library managed to produce "Fen and Furrow" : a list of their local books (though not covering Cambridge itself), why not us.

There have in the past been two major lists of Cambridge titles chief amongst which is Robert Bowes "A catalogue of books printed at or relating to ... Cambridge from 1521 to 1893" published in 1894. It was supplemented in 1912 by a Catalogue of the books and papers collected by John Willis Clark and bequeathed by him to Cambridge University Library.

Now these have been joined by a third. Dr Pierre Gorman has collected Cambridge books for over forty years, amassing one of the largest private collections around which he has now donated to his local University Library, that of Melbourne, Australia. They have issued printed catalogues of nearly 1,300 titles published between 1574 and the present day, one arranged by author, another by date which shows how books have continued to be issued particularly in recent years with nearly 150 during the 1990s. A third catalogue, by subject is in course of preparation

The catalogues are available both in printed form and on computer disk from the Baillieu Library, University of Melbourne, Australia and may be consulted (but still not as yet to take away) in the Cambridgeshire Collection. They are an essential guide for anybody wishing to read about the city and University.

Dear Pierre

thank you for you parcel containtng the catalogues of Cambridge books.

It was nice to hear from you again for I feared that perhaps all your exertions whilst here in Cambridge may have proved too strenuous. I now suspect that all your energies have gone into the compilation of your catalogues.

I have browsed them with interest, though not yet scanned each item page by page seeking items we have missed in our own files.

One or two slight discrepancies seem to have arisen for example the works by Arthur Beales Gray (the bookbinder) are listed between those of Arthur Gray (Master of Jesus college), you have Salman instead of Salmon for the author of Foreigners companion and Cantabrigia illustrata rather than Cantabrigia for the Sayer. There is also the old problem of authors who insist on using abbreviations for their forenames.

These are just small points to prove I have looked at the work and to disguise my envy that you have produced such an important work of scholarship which will be of great benefit to many people

I have featured it in a forthcoming article for the Cambridge Weekly News and will send a cutting when it is issued

Life in the Collection continues apace with developments in the new technology line involving a Geographic Information System, the development of our scanning and hopeful printing facilities and the ability to search various items on CD, including Palmer's Index to the Times.

Chris has finally issued his first book of pictures of Ely and area (in which I believe he has managed to include pictures of all his family) and is planning another on Cambridge.

Library reorganisation continues apace with a reduction in opening hours for all the county's libraries (except for us who are to increase hours!) and talk of closer links between local studies libraries, the county record office, museums and archaeology. This latter has been trumpeted before and come to nothing. However in recent months we have seen the retirement of the County Archivist and the departure of the County Archaeologist or more properly she has been granted a 19 month sabbatical to get her to the required retirement age. Effectively this means two of the longest established "Heritage" officers have gone leaving just me. Voluntary redundancy forms are going around again but I think I will stick it out for a bit longer if I get the chance

Domestically we lost father just before Christmas and now have mother in Addenbrooke's Hospital so that with one thing and another life is somewhat hectic at present

I trust things stay well with you and look forward to volume three in due course

It was one of the biggest funerals the small village had ever seen. Contingents of Cambridgeshire police, Territorials and Cambridge University Officer Training Corps joined the procession to the churchyard where two coffins were laid side by side. One contained the body of an old soldier William Holden Westnutt who had enlisted in Cambridge in September 1857 and served his country for over 10 years before returning to his native Caldecote. The other was that of a much younger man, former Sergeant William Nicholas who had soldiered for 21 years before making his home in the village. The two became firm friends and had died on the same day at the same hour.

It had been the idea of the Chief Constable that they should be buried in a joint military funeral and hundreds of people flocked to watch the spectacle. They included a photographer who issued a series of postcards just donated to the Collection. It would appear however that there is no headstone to the graves in which they lay and that without the snaps, and the account in the Cambridge Chronicle of May 1914, the story would be largely forgotten

By contrast Louis Mander Stokes is commemorated on four memorials, half of which he had no real connection with. He attended St Faith's Preparatory School and Rugby School but was killed before he took up his place at Corpus Christi College whilst Lt Wilbraham would have been just a name to him for his father did not take up Ministry there until 1917, the year following his son's death at the Battle of the Somme and burial in Mailly Wood Cemetery.

Henry Paine Stokes was a fellow of Corpus and, at the start of the Great War, vicar of St Paul's church in Cambridge. He sent his son to Rugby School and kept the letters that the lad wrote home from September 1911. Through them he learned of Toast fagging and other rituals which marked Public School life at the time. Soon however there was conflict ahead for as the world was plunged into war Louis felt he must pay his part whilst his father, a member of the Cambridge Arbitration Association, was ardently opposed to militarism. Letters home soon record the sacrifices which former Rugby students had already made 100 killed by May 1915 one of whom had sat at the very desk the lad now used.

Louis agreed to sit the entrance examination for his father's old college and failed, his heart was set on the Royal Marines. Soon he was being saluted by sergeants and writing home for his school manual on shooting. He went overseas in July 1916, writing home to describe his living and sleeping conditions and in November to thank them for a parcel of fruitcake, nuts and socks a welcome relief after a long and muddy task. "I wish I could tell you what we are doing, but I can't. However I am having great fun, as I hope you are". It was the last he wrote.

A selection of newspaper cuttings, carefully snipped from the Cambridge Daily News of March 1947 have been given to the Collection. They show how on just 49 years ago today the county was in chaos due to a heavy fall of snow.

Housewives were being urged to conserve their liquid milk supplies since roads blocked by snow were preventing the milk lorries getting through to farms. Elsworth and Knapwell were completely cut off with waist high drifts in the village and children enjoying an enforced absence from school.

County roads chiefs proclaimed it the worse snow since 1927. Conditions around Linton, Caxton and Newmarket were particularly bad with drifts varying from two to twelve feet and the London to Newmarket road was blocked between Royston and Duxford aerodrome. Several cars were stranded and at the foot of Clunchpit Hill between Royston and Kneesworth a private car, a N.A.A.F.I. van and two mail vans were dug out of deep drifts

Several country buses services from Cambridge were suspended, whilst Eastern Counties were estimating that it would be two days before their vehicles could force a passage between Exning and Burwell which, like Soham, Fordham, Wicken and Isleham were completely cut off by road. School buses had been unable to get round to Gazeley, Kennett and other neighbouring villages whilst workers employed at Pyes and Chivers have had to spend the day at home.

Soon however the snow was melting fast and by 14th March Cambridge was hit by some of the worst flooding for nearly 30 years. Silver street was closed to all traffic, the Backs under water, Midsummer Common was a swimming pool for ducks and houses in Riverside had a foot of river in their ground floor rooms. Meanwhile at the Tivoli cinema near Mitcham's Corner management were reporting their front stalls flooded but were denying the rumour of a change in their programme to "I cover the waterfront"

At Linton houses in Meadow Lane and Chapel Terrace were evacuated and water rose to well over knee deep. Hinxton, Stapleford and Whittlesford were also experiencing flooding whilst at Sawston the sub power station was marooned and electricity supplies cut off

Then on 16th March came a gale which added to the havoc, stripping the roof from the kitchens of Downing College and from a pre fab in Gilbert Close. In Fitzroy Street the window of Taylor's chemists shop shattered and sponges valued between 35 and 45 shillings each were blown away whilst tiles from its roof hurtled across the road and smashed a second floor window in Laurie & McConnal's shop opposite. Trees were uprooted and chaos continued but the newspapers had other and even more dramatic news to report from the fens as has been told before.

Whilst millions come to Cambridge to admire the magnificence of the college architecture few will ever penetrate into the maze of University buildings which occupy the large chunk of central area from the Corn Exchange to Downing College

The Collection itself does not attempt to fully cover the activities of the University departments but in recent weeks two items have come our way which provide an insight into this most important area

One is a series of maps compiled 60 years ago by G.S. Graham Smith of the Pathology department which chart the development of the area from 1574 to 1936. In the early days the land between Pease Market (Peas Hill), Slaughter house lane (Corn Exchange Street), Dowdivers Lane (Downing Street) and Lutborne Lane (Free School Lane) belonged to an Augustinian Friary, founded in 1290 and was surrounded by a wall.

When the Friary ceased in 1538 the Professor of Physic bought the grounds and lived there. He left the house and grounds to the University in his will of 1584 but this was not implemented. Instead it passed to Stephen Perse who left part of the site for a free grammar school and for almshouses.

By 1720 the old Friary buildings had become ruinous and were pulled down whilst much of the remaining site was given to the University for a Botanic Garden in 1762. When this moved in 1831 it left the ground clear for the erection of the new laboratories necessary for the growth in the teaching of natural sciences then been undertaken by the University

This included a department of Chemistry, completed 1888, although the first Professor had been appointed in 1702. Initially laboratories were set up in various colleges including Sidney Sussex where complaints about the smell of fumes soon caused it to be relocated. The most significant research to be undertaken there was that of Thomas Heycock and Francis Neville who for some 30 years studied metallurgy including alloys of gold and aluminium work which was to prove significant in the development of semiconductors some 100 years later.

When Neville retired in 1908 his colleague moved his work to the Chemistry Laboratory in Pembroke Street as Reader in Metallurgy a position funded by the Goldsmith's Company who later gave a grant of L5,500 for the laboratory which now carries their name.

The old Sidney Street laboratories stood empty until students celebrating the success of their rowing crew during the 1910 May Bumping Races smashed its glass roof, burning books and papers, laboratory notes and photographic negatives in what the Cambridge Daily News described as "youth having its fling" and which led to Sidney Sussex students being barred from Heycock's lectures for some years to follow.

Reflections by Mike Petty 20 March 1996

Old papers fade away. No matter how well treated what started out as white and supple becomes old and brittle and given any rough handling soon crumbles into dust

The same applies to old soldiers except that they start out much fitter and stronger before being subjected to treatment much more violent than words on paper can record. Dennis Poulter was born in Babraham in 1924 and played his part during the Second World War as a Royal Marine. But now he has turned his attention to other conflicts and to the pages of those crumbling local newspapers which include some record of the sacrifices made by Sawston men in earlier conflicts.

There were no Cambridgeshire journalist in 1643 when John Byatt took part in the engagement at Linton Bridge as one of the King's army who were utterly defeated by a Roundhead night attack.

By the time of the Crimean war villagers could learn of local involvement and letters home from those taking part in the Boer War give some insight into suffering "it is horrible here. God and those engaged only know"

Inevitably however it is the period 1914 to 1919 which makes the greatest impact. Dennis sketches the international and Sawston scene as well as recording the words written home and reported in the local paper such as the sinking of H.M.S. Aboukir in September 1914 which left Alfred Maskell drifting for 30 hours semiconscious on a raft whilst 1,400 others drowned.

Private Spicer wrote home in May 1915 "... a shell came over and struck a house at the corner of the market square and killed several soldiers. One poor chap had his head blown off ... but of course we get used to this. It made one think of home if the Germans were to get there, and yet there are scores of able bodied chaps that will not join the Army"

When conscription was introduced in 1916 local tribunals were set up to decide who should be put into reserved occupations or who should be sent to the front. Companies such as leather manufacturers Thomas Evans had to fight to keep skilled men, as did butchers, dairymen and shopkeepers. Alfred Wakefield, aged 40, married with seven children was engaged in making gloves for munitions workers and had fifteen girls under him he was exempted for a time, though as the situation got worse the regulations became even tighter.

Even so at the end of the war there was disagreement in Sawston over a memorial to the fallen heroes. Now flesh has been added to the bare names etched in stone and now crumbling away.

Copies of the book will be made to order from Dennis Poulter, 43 Churchfield Ave, Sawston CB2 4LA. It deserves to sell in the thousands.

IT WAS Rag Week recently but I missed it.

Fortunately somebody brought us a Rag Mag so that future researchers may learn from print what was not overtly obvious in the street - that "a bunch of utterly crazy students" had been "doing even more utterly crazy things" to raise money for local, national and international charities Among the "wild and wacky events" were a comedy revue, a beer-fest, bed race and procession while the magazine itself reprinted "old, tried and tested" jokes including the profound observation that "A university is a fountain of knowledge where all come to drink".

A glance back at the equivalent for 1969 shows that students then favoured more political comment reprinting what it claimed to be captured enemy documents from Vietnam and quotes from two contradictory speeches of Harold Wilson of 1961 and 1964 relating to the Dunkirk spirit.

Sixties students raised money through concerts featuring Fairport Convention and The Who, arm wrestling, an attempt on the world prune-eating record or a dwyle flonking marathon. Turning back to 1959 and the Rag target was to be raised through a cycle marathon, the World Bridge Record, a Tiddley Winks grand prix, punt joisting and the Dagenham Girl Pipers.

The magazine was prefaced by the President of the British Legion extolling the importance of the funds being raised to support the Earl Haig Poppy Day appeal - later dropped during a period of discussion and dispute.

The changing face of the Rag activities is one of the issues summarised in "From our Cambridge correspondent" - a selection of articles from the student magazine, "Varsity" over the last 50 years but perhaps the high spots of undergraduate excesses and genius had been earlier in the century. One was in 1905 when the Mayor received a telegram announcing the arrival at Cambridge station of the Sultan of Zanzibar and requesting appropriate arrangements be put in place to ensure him an adequate tour of the University. Accordingly the Mayor sent the horse-omnibus from the Bull Hotel with an inn servant as his representative and the party were duly shown the principal sights - an exercise made more difficult by the apparent lack of any understanding of the English language (apart from a very familiar swear-word when one of the party stubbed his toe). On their return to the station the assembled crowds were amazed to see the VIPs gather up their robes and make a speedy dash back up Station Road. It was soon exposed as an undergraduate hoax probably echoing a jape in 1873 when Mayor & University had found themselves waiting for-lornly at

Cambridge station for a non-arriving Shah of Persia - an event recalled just weeks earlier by the Cambridge Daily News

Quite why the person responsible for the Cambridgeshire Collection in December 1946 chose to keep one of the many posters displayed on the notice boards in the library in Wheeler Street is a mystery.

The advertisement for the contest of Foot the Ball was most distinctive, parodying those issued in Victorian times posters which were themselves filed away afterwards.

The event itself was unusual with two teams of fifteen players dressed in Victorian costume. The kick offs were performed by the Mayor, the Chief Constable and the Senior University Proctor three being needed since the game was to be played with three balls and if history was to be any guide they would also be needed to exercise their respective authority in sorting out the rowdiness that was certain to follow.

In 1579 the Head Constable, Thomas Parise, was one of a team of local men who challenged student sportsmen to "play at the fote ball" on ground near Chesterton church. Unbeknown to the scholars the home team had secretly hidden staves in the church porch and during the course of the game "did pike quarrells agenst the schollars, and did bringe owte there staves, wherewith they did so beat the schollers that divers had there heades broken and wear driven to runne throughe the river" to escape.

Others turned to the Constable and urged him to do his duty and restore peace wherewith Parise "did turne to the schollers, willing them to keep the queenes peace, and turning to the townsmen of Chesterton, willed them to beat the schollers downe".

The result of the match was not reported, the result of the brawl was that the Constable was imprisoned in Cambridge castle.

By contrast the 1946 engagement was relatively peaceful, though one player was penalised for forgetting to remove his top hat before heading the ball and if one or two beards were torn off it was only to do with the strength of post war elastic.

The final result on the day was a 6 4 win for Cambridge, success being clinched in the third half when two balls entered the Oxford goal at the same time.

The final result of the match may be known if the planned reunion does take place, some 50 years later, when the original poster may once again be displayed.

It is always a sad experience to be invited into a house which was once somebody's home and which now has to be cleared. Books which have been collected and cherished must now be dispersed giving others the opportunity to acquire and cherish but before the dealers are invited in some people, who have perhaps appreciated using the Collection, will give us the opportunity of selecting items for preservation in our files.

Most books we will already have both in our main collections and in the duplicate stock which is available for home reading but extra copies of certain titles are always welcome.

So it is that two finely bound volumes of Henry Gunning's "Reminiscences of the University, town and county of Cambridge" have recently come into our possession by coincidence just a week or so after I had serialised them in my weekly "Cambridgeshire echoes" spot on Mandy Morton's Sunday arts and entertainment programme on BBC Radio Cambridgeshire.

They indeed make most interesting reading with Gunning's description of shooting snipe in Coe Fen, taking wildfowl on Foulmire Mere (now a bird reserve) and exploring the fens around Bottisham where local lads carried the University sportsmen's game and supplied them with long poles to enable the hunter to leap the very wide ditches which intersected the fens in every direction.

Clayhithe provided a popular meeting place as there was a public house on each side of the river where the ale was very good and the fishing assured. For the landlord of the smaller pub kept well stocked ponds where for a modest charge sportsmen could net sufficient fish to ensure themselves a tale with which to regale their college friends. There was usually assistance on hand in the form of a good natured, pipe smoking bystander who always willing to give advice and lend a hand in landing the catch but only when the big fish had unaccountably escaped the net did the scholar learn that countryfolk could teach even the most academically gifted a thing or two about maximising the profits of their landlord friends.

Gunning attended the opening of Stourbridge Fair, joining the University party in consuming quantities of Oysters at the Oyster House; he recorded the activities of Richard Kidman who masterminded a series of robberies of plate from various colleges and was only discovered after his accomplice's house had been literally pulled down to reveal the hidden store of silver.

Elizabeth Woodcock, buried in snow for seven days and Jemmy Gordon, notorious drunkard who so scared magistrates that they tolerated his outbursts for fear of what he should declare publicly about their own failings are just two of the remarkable characters to be met with in the pages of Gunning's reminiscences truly a book to be cherished for a lifetime

It was really just a programme like so many others : plenty of advertisements for up to date furniture from Laurie and McConnal, comfortable road travel on the Varsity Express Motors and wine from Matthews of Trinity street.

Theatre goers paid them little heed preferring instead to read an analysis of the following week's production or even the names of the actors whose appearance on the stage before them they awaited with anticipation.

But the thing that made it special to us was that it enabled us to complete our file of Festival Theatre programmes for 1935, one more volume could now go to binding, one more set complete.

In truth tracking down the programmes of the Festival is almost as complicated as sorting out the story of the Theatre itself. Happily all has now been made clear in a new history which recounts the development of drama from a temporary wooden and canvas structure erected during Stourbridge Fair, where in 1802 a cry of fire panicked a packed house leaving five people trodden to death and the building condemned as unsafe.

A new Theatre opened near the junction of East Road and Newmarket Road in September 1808 though not even the excellence of the Norwich players nor productions such as "Merry Wives of Windsor" could revive audiences and the building was auctioned in 1815.

By then its replacement was already in being, designed by William Wilkins and lauded in 1814 as "the best provincial theatre in the Kingdom". Crowds flocked to the comic pantomime "Harelquin and Mother Goose" but their favourite was the tragic melodrama entitled "George Barnwell".

The theatre could hold about 700 people in its commodious and well arranged gallery, upper circle, private boxes, dress circle and pit and was visited by many famous Victorian actors during its 60 year run before it was put up for sale. In November 1878 it reopened with tea and buns for 600 people but as an Evangelistic Mission Hall those seeking their more traditional entertainment transferred to another Theatre Royal, this time in Mill Road, soon renamed Sturton Town Hall, Empire Music Hall and finally the Kinema

In 1926 the curtain rose on a new era and most exciting period of drama when Terence Gray established The Festival Theatre. What happened next is told by Roy Brazier who carries the story beyond its closure in 1935 to the 1995 performance by the Marlowe Dramatic Society and expresses the hope that perhaps the future for the building might become once more as successful as its past Cambridge colleges are a community unto themselves. Secure within their walls they control their own affairs through Master and Fellows desperately concerned about their own college, often less knowledgeable or bothered about the life outside. Likewise those outside will have little grasp of the fundamental changes in every branch of college life, work and ethos they have experienced during the post war years.

A visitor invited to join their number for a meal at the Top Table will enjoy great hospitality and the brief companionship of number of Fellows whose names one may hear but whose expertise and background one can only guess at.

Now however Corpus Christi has produced a volume of biographical essays on its senior staff from 1952 to 1994 or in their terms from the Mastership of Sir George Thomson to that of Michael McCrum. Two Bishops, two University Librarians and one remarkable nonagenarian, Archie Clark Kennedy, who was a Fellow for almost 66 years, oldest member of the Youth Hostels Association and mountain climber at the age of 80 feature amongst its pages.

Not all senior academics are such pleasant personalities. William Chafy voted for himself in the Mastership election at Sidney Sussex college in 1807. It was the only vote he received. However in 1813 his opponent was disqualified from the post having himself never been a Fellow of the college and Chafy found himself Master.

He seemed to be what teachers now call a strong personality – an arrogant bully. A solicitor described his tone as "loud and imperious" and complained that the Master had "thrust out his tongue at him". His enemies sought to discredit him by sending letters to the Cambridge Chronicle in Chafy's style and signed with his name, whilst his reputation has suffered since the majority of contemporary writers were unsympathetic to his politics and position within the University.

As both Master and Bursar he had a most secure position and could dominate College council meetings. He undertook the refurbishment of the Masters Lodge, making it a fit place for the lavish entertainment for which he was famous.

He also masterminded the building of houses in the Master's garden – the rents for which should go to himself, in Malcolm Street and in Sussex street – where the contractor claimed Chafy wanted so many alterations "that I'll build as I like, for all the Master, the Fellows and the Devil". It all resulted in extra expense, in court cases and redevelopment taking five years longer than planned.

Chafy may not have been popular with his colleagues and the work undertaken during his Mastership soon denigrated but he made his mark on college life and features in a most interesting series of essays produced to mark the College's quartercentary celebrations

Reflections by Mike Petty 1st May 1996

Each Sunday thousands of people go to church. Many are delighted with recent changes such in the forms of worship, others may be less content with the religious state of affairs. At Kingston in 1993 church life was flourishing though they had been without a Rector for some years and their community was suffering as a result. Their concerns are outlined in a wide ranging parish profile produced in 1993 and recently received in the Collection.

Two other items accessioned on that same day reveal problems in local parishes are nothing new.

Kirtling is a small village near Newmarket which at the turn of the century was dominated by its squire, Lord North. He was a Roman Catholic with a private chapel and chaplain of his own at his home, Kirtling Tower, adjacent to the church. The North Family had however added a memorial chapel to the parish church in the sixteenth century in which several members of the family were interred.

In 1905 his Lordship noticed that a communion table had been placed in "the family's private chapel" and the new Vicar had started conducting services there. He ordered him to stop. The Vicar however was reluctant to surrender one third of his church and felt that this represented an attack on his ministry. Matters were exasperated when the Catholic chaplain objected to the inclusion of religious material in the Vicar's parish magazine and supplied a list of 10 parishioners who did not wish to receive it – though the Vicar claimed the right to deliver it to anyone who wanted them.

Some details of the dispute are contained in copies of correspondence at the County Record Office, though the magazines themselves have not apparently survived. In her University dissertation Rachel Kemsley has been unable to locate other reports of the controversy which came to a head in 1906 when the Vicar resigned claiming North "has made further demands which ... he may be inclined to drop if I leave". Was it a clash of personalities, or had the resignation something to do with the poverty of the post a mere L92 a year when even L200 was thought of as a "starvation living".

There are more records to chart the dispute at Madingley in 1894 when it was the Lord of the Manor who complained that the new Vicar had introduced "popery" and established a separate meeting house where many parishioners worshipped instead of at the church. This not only deprived the Vicar of his congregation but also of the support of the wealthiest man for the church restoration which was then necessary. Vestry meetings were attended by no one except the Vicar until in 1897 when a large attendance protested at the installation of a new altar without necessary permission, leading to a consistory court hearing in Cambridge which ordered its removal.

The week seems dominated by the bicycle. It started with the arrival of a copy of "The boneshaker" for Spring 1996 containing an article on the Honourable Ion Keith Falconer and the Cambridge University bicycle club, which itself owes much to this column where some months ago I reported the arrival of photographs of cycle races of the 1880s now reproduced in this journal of the Veteran cycle club. Since then we have been in communication with another researcher anxious to add to the known records of cycling in Cambridge.

By coincidence my colleague this week discovered in the Cambridge Chronicle of August 1857 a letter of complaint about two undergraduates on a double velocipede running down a child watching a Punch and Judy show in Barnwell. His attack on "this dangerous and ever growing evil" prompted another correspondent to describe the machines which were propelled by the pressure of the rider's feet on the ground as ridiculous and immoral whenever he met one he went "as close to upsetting it as possible ... I long to send it and its lunatic piped propeller to immortal smash"

The velocipede was defended by John Howes ... one might imagine they were "miniature cars of Juggernaut and that broken arms and legs were of frequent occurrence". However he had had the management of them for 14 or 15 years and could positively state that no accident had occurred except such slight ones "as the clothes brush, soap and court plaister" could remedy.

The machines were already popular in 1843 for when Queen Victoria visited Cambridge in October her progress was greeted by crowds in carriages, "spring van, tumbril gig, and even the eccentric velocipede for which these parts are famous"

An even earlier reference occurs in the Cambridge Chronicle for 14th May 1819 when the Cambridge Improvement Commissioners issued a notice "that any person riding a Machine entitled a Velocipede upon the foot pavement ... is liable to the penalty of twenty shillings". Perhaps by coincidence the next issue includes an advertisement for the sale of furniture and effects of a gentleman leaving Cambridge including two piano forte, three violins, two aeolian harps and a velocipede by Johnson.

Proper bicycling increased in popularity with the invention of pneumatic tyres and Ernest Terah Hooley made his fortune by buying up the Humber and other cycle companies and then selling the shares on the stock market. Using the profits he bought the Dunlop Tyre Company for £3 million and then sold it for £5M. He went on to add to his property empire the estates at Papworth where he entertained the great and the good to extravagant parties. He became a millionaire but went bankrupt for a million and a half and ended up serialising his memoirs in the News of the World extracts from which have also recently come our way.

Reflections by Mike Petty 15th May 1996

Having closed the Cambridgeshire Collection at 7pm (though the last reader had left about an hour before) I was driving to my meeting with Swaffham Bulbeck Women's Institute, wondering how I could describe what had been a comparatively quiet day and listening on the car radio to Brother Cadfael's adventures at Shrewsbury in 1143 expertly recounted on an audio book.

Suddenly amongst the details of a disinterred woman's body discovered by the Abbey plough team came a graphic account of the attack by Geoffrey de Mandeville on Ramsey abbey standing isolated on its small island in the middle of inhospitable fenland. A contemporary chronicler recorded the devastation which followed and that "while the church was held as a castle, blood issued from the walls of the church and of the adjacent cloister"

Here was a good starting point for my talk for that same Geoffrey had subsequently attacked King Stephen's castle at nearby Burwell. His first assault carried the outer lines of the defences. Geoffrey paused, removing his helmet in the July heat, the better to spot some part of the as yet unconquered walls where his final attack might be delivered. As he did so a single arrow from the castle walls grazed his ear and temple a derisory wound which did not deter his attack, but did lead to his death through infection a short time later. Whether this detail is included in "The potter's field" I cannot yet say for I am only on the second of the six cassettes.

Had it been a book I could scan its pages, as I have been doing to seek details of another character who influenced both local and national life.

Stretham has in its centre a fine stone cross of which little is recorded save the tale that when Bishop Morton was on his way to take up his appointment at Ely in 1478 he was so overcome by the magnificent appearance of the Cathedral that he stripped himself of his rich apparel and walked bare foot the remainder of the distance to Ely.

Yet this Bishop John Morton has been another unknown quantity, for he apparently has no biographer yet played a vital role in the most troubled Wars of the Roses between 1455 and 1487 when blood ran far more freely than in even de Mandeville's time. Morton himself witnessed a battle at Ferrybridge in the bitter winter of 1461 when some 20,000 men were slaughtered in an area of bloodstained snow some six miles long and three miles wide. He survived the changing fortunes of the period, switching allegiance from Lancaster to York, being imprisoned in the Tower of London, and made Archbishop of Canterbury. His story is told, along with that of Margaret Beaufort whose arms dominate the gateways of Christs and St John's colleges in a survey of the lives of five men and women who played their part in a most complicated period of English history but still leaves the mystery of our cross unsolved

Twelve ladies of a certain age come under the spotlight in a new study. The age is that one before their sex was formally admitted to membership of the University in 1947. Their number include Eleanor Sidgwick one of the founders of Newnham college, Mary Paley Marshall whose marriage to economist Alfred was far from idyllic and Marjorie Stephenson whose work on bacterial biochemistry earned her the distinction of being one of the first women to be elected as Fellow of the Royal Society.

Frances Cornford, Charles Darwin's granddaughter, recorded her impressions of Rupert Brooke in her poems and was with him on the day the First World War broke out. She mourned his death as she did that of her son John who, having gained admittance into her husband's college, Trinity, aged 17 (and having fathered a child shortly afterwards) elected to play his part in the Spanish Civil War where he perished. By then Frances was suffering a period of intense depression from which she emerged to share their Conduit Head Road home with refugees and evacuees from the Second World War before the early death of her husband.

Eileen Power, economic and social historian, taught at Girton in 1914 when sentries searched each car passing along Huntingdon road and was there at the end of the War when a horde of undergraduates stormed up to the college demanding "where are all the women we have been fighting for?". Hanging out of every window were the girls in question as the Mistress and senior dons received the invaders at the doorway under the arch and invited them to a dance at college the following Saturday.

Helen Cam another Girton historian supported the fledgling Romsey Town Labour Club in the 1930s and wrote a most detailed account of the city's history. She is remembered as a medieval figure, wrapped in a black cloak, serious and matronly who would listen carefully to a student's theory and remark "this is nonsense, think again". She had a rigorous regard for fact, evidence and honesty of argument and a single eloquent "Oh|" in the margin of an essay would be enough to cause the writer to reconsider

One wonders how many "Oh|"s she might have written in the pages of a new county history guide with its frank and personal comments about the county's bleak and boring landscapes ... Cambridge Guildhall which "might have been designed by Albert Speer on an off day" ... and Lion Yard littered with cider drinking vagabonds ... whilst on the outskirts overpriced yellow brick houses prompt salesmen of plastic doors to ply profitably "with grins as gaping and as ill fitting as their product".

Those seeking historical facts on University education can learn of a Girton girl who became the only Classics candidate to be awarded first class honours. "For this achievement she was allowed to marry the Master of Trinity". Oh|

Church, school and pub are three of the basic ingredients of village life. These commonplace topics come together also in a new history of Teversham which examines the village in detail over the fifty years from 1850 to 1900.

Tables of occupations culled from census enumerators returns combine with details from school log books and local newspapers to recreate a period of considerable change. We are introduced to the notable characters such as Corney Grain, a Victorian entertainer who was born in the village and whose memoirs recall topics such as the church band of two clarinets and a violincello who produced a sound probably unique in its style with no attempt at harmony or even of melody, each individual going whichever way his instrument took him. The clerk would give one line of the hymn and then proceed to sing it solo whilst the orchestra gambolled around the melody and the congregation stood respectfully listening to the nasal voiced shoemaker snuffing forth some dreary tune which discord reigned triumphant about him.

At the General election of 1885 the Rector endeavoured to lead his flock along the paths of righteousness as he saw it. For the farm workers were to have the vote for the first time and had the choice of two candidates, the more Liberal of which was the founder and publisher of the popular magazine "Tit Bits", George Newnes. To the Rector's chagrin he was elected.

Then there was the workhouse, intended to be a regime harder than that lived by the poorest labourers in their own homes although inmates were kept clean and dry, adequately clothed and had just about enough to eat. They could not live in family units nor receive visitors without the express permission of the Workhouse master. They were however free to leave whenever they chose although they must not take with them any article belonging to the workhouse including the clothes they were issued with. Anybody doing so could be brought back and charged with theft. One such was Thomas Carter who was found guilty in 1850 and sentenced to fourteen days hard labour in the county gaol though as prison food was acknowledged to be superior to that in the workhouse it was difficult to see how such imprisonment was a deterrent.

The school was subject to regular inspection with absenteeism a regular complaint with in 1885 half the children absent, some working in the fields, some nursing at home, others playing at home because their mothers had not time to get them ready for school though time was obviously at a premium most days if the number attending with dirty faces and unclean pinafores was anything to go by.

Although "Thoroughly commonplace" it makes most interesting reading of everyday life in a Victorian village

By 1794 the British parliament viewed with alarm the situation in France where, following the Revolution, power had been seized by Napoleon Bonaparte.

There was a distinct threat of invasion and the Government took steps to establish a fighting force in each county who could be called upon to resist. Thus on 29th March 1794 a meeting was called at the Crown Inn in Huntingdon where leading figures pledged themselves to form a Volunteer Cavalry "for the suppression of any seditious or other riots or tumults, in this or any other neighbouring county" with further commitments in the event of an actual invasion. Heading the lists were the Earls of Manchester, Sandwich, and Hinchbrook along with their loyal friend and supporter Owsley Rowley. Owsley was the man entrusted with the money to pay expenses for hiring horses, renting rooms for meetings, employing clerks and making lists of the names of those willing to fight in cavalry or infantry, including James Chambor servant, William Colopost boy, John Stevens baptist minister and numerous bakers, butchers and publicans. Cavalrymen needed a horse and horse cost money, there was also payment to the men themselves at a daily rate of 3/ {shillings} (about £20.00 {pounds} at present prices).

Several of the volunteers soon sought exemption and others supplied substitutes, all of which must have added to Rowley's workload especially at a time when he was busy building himself a new residence at Priory Hill, St Neots. By 1799 however he could report a force of 1141 horses, only to find Parliament changing its mind as to the need for them and disbanding such troops|

By 1801 Parliament was once more seeking a Militia of men on foot to meet the renewed French threat and once more Owsley was prominent in his role as tax collector for the county often sleeping with perhaps £30,000 (£3 million at today's rates) in his house and two loaded pistols at his bedside.

Papers related to these and other Rowley family activities have been reconstructed from amongst piles of family papers which have lain untouched in a warehouse in St Neots and now published for the first time.

Trevor Bevis also includes some record of the Napoleonic threat in his latest book on Ely telling how in 1809 the Militia there expressed great dissatisfaction at being told they had to pay for their knapsack and gaiters out of the guinea they were paid. Several refused and were arrested with four squadrons of German cavalry galloping in a single day from Ipswich to ensure peace. The ringleaders were sentenced to receive 500 lashes each and the thought of English volunteers being publicly flogged by German troops excited wide opposition.

Many books carry acknowledgements to the assistance of the Cambridgeshire Collection, They may draw upon our newspaper indexing, select from our illustrations or compile their information from the wealth of material previously published. The danger in all this is that the new book may end up just regurgitating things already recorded - and perpetuating the errors that inevitably creep in to even the best-researched book

Great Shelford residents therefore decided that their latest publication should draw mainly upon the untold stories of local people, by encouraging people to reminisce and record the elements of village life which they had most knowledge of. Thus the village library, opened in 1945 in a small shop in the High Street for three afternoon and one evening a week started with just 490 readers but now boasts issues of over 100,000 books every year, With so much happening in the community it is surprising anybody has time to read as the pen-pictures of the W.I., Red Cross or Royal British Legion will testify - and in what other book would the activities of the Dog Owners' Association fill a full page!

The story of the village bobby is told; set up to deal with "tramps, wandering thieves, half lunatics and other questionable characters" in 1834 patrols had to be carried out on foot for nine hours - four in daylight and five at night for which the constable was paid 21/7 (£1.08). Although the village's own police station has now closed community policing has been introduced and radio communication and Panda cars improve response times, One incident requiring their attention was in 1970 when an Unidentified Flying Object was spotted in a field, now Chaston Way, by a police motor-cyclists who called for reinforcements. Local and national newspapers took up the story, as did BBC television intrigued by the arrival of the space rocket with its tall tapering nose, bright flashing light and eerie rasping sound. It had arrived in the field on the back of a wooden go-kart having been constructed as a prank by two naughty schoolchildren who have now confessed their part in the incident.

Perhaps the same children may have been providing the information for a new pamphlet on Haunted Cambridge, or perhaps the author has indulged too fully of the brews sold in some of the pubs he visited to compile his piece of research. No sources are actually quoted to prove the existence of a phantom squirrel apparently last seen in 1927, whilst the information that Rupert Brooke died in Greece of sunstroke may cause other histories to be rewritten. John Pink might indeed haunt the balconies of the old library in Wheeler Street - certainly there was often clicking and creaking which seemed to coincide with the lighting of the boiler - but research in the Street directories has as yet failed to locate "15 Sidney Park" where hauntings were said to have occurred until 1915. Perhaps it is all a ploy to attract tourists to visit Arbury Road where a gigantic ghostly black dog is apparently to be seen bounding along at high speed and growling.

If so it has not deterred the congregation from attending Arbury Baptist Church whose 150th anniversary souvenir booklet is packed with dates and facts culled from their records and enlivened by personal memories from worshippers. No matter what the quality of the research none would ever be read where it not for the skills of the printer. Anglia Polytechnic University will close its printing division in August this year, 73 years after it was set up as part of the School of Art. Designed to train boys and girls for employment on skilled industries it has succeeded in introducing generations of printers to their craft and kept up-to-date on the ever changing technology, Their story has now been told in a booklet compiled by the Head of the department, Featuring both black and white and colour photography it goes without saying that it is immaculately printed!

Mike Petty Stories from a Year - 1888

In July 1888 an important piece of Cambridge was sold by auction at the Lion Hotel for £5,400. Prospective purchasers did not have far to go to view the property for it was right beside the hotel itself

Numbers 8 and 9 Petty Cury included a double-fronted shop and four-bedroomed house, and printing offices let to Messrs Foister and Jagg. But the main property was the old-established fully licensed inn known as "The Falcon" with its bar, bar parlour, large smoke and billiard rooms, eight bedrooms and three attics. It came complete with the Falcon Tap with its bar, sitting room with six rooms above and cellars

Obviously a desirable property and of some antiquity, it had once belonged to Richard Kinge of Wisbech who had willed it in 1504 to the prior of Barnwell. Queen Elizabeth I is said to have stayed in a suite of rooms along one of the open galleries & to have watched Shakespeare or Marlowe performing their plays in the yard beneath. When here the university petitioned her to limit the export of corn from the town and so keep Cambridge prices low - a plea she rejected

She also courted disapproval by abolishing a centuries-old tradition, the Corpus Christi procession which involved a parade with the college Master carrying a tabernacle of silver-gilt containing the Host, the whole protected under a canopy. On the final procession that canopy caught fire as it past the Falcon – possibly caused by somebody deliberately "casting fire thereon out of some window"

By Victorian times however the grandeur had long passed. By 1850 it had become the most disgraceful slum in Cambridge. About 300 people lived in the Yard and "there are two privies for the use of the whole of the inhabitants, but as they are at a distance of fifty yards from some portion of the premises those of the inhabitants who have back windows to their rooms are in the habit of throwing all their refuse out of the windows on to a large dung heap in the Red Lion yard, the reeking steam from which is constantly penetrating the room"

One woman described the single room in which she had lived for 34 years, the bed "as big as an old pocket handkerchief" had to accommodate her husband and daughter as well. Another bedded down in a room with no light whatsoever, a candle revealing a black hole in which a pile of clothes on the floor served for bedding.

The stately galleries so loved by antiquarians had been divided into apartments let at rent varying from 1 /4 to 2/- per week and although several were remarkably clean "the majority are as wretched as it is possible to conceive". By 1885 they had been condemned by the Medical Officer of Health and the poor forced to find other lodgings

Redevelopment soon followed the sale in 1888, one side of the Yard being replaced by offices, while the galleried side was demolished for extensions to the old Lion Hotel about 1904. The design included an archway across the yard, a feature reproduced in the modern Lion Yard development whose large windows on the first floor recall the ancient galleries where once a Queen, then later many beggars slept.

Not another new paper!

Such was the reaction that greeted the first edition of the Cambridgeshire Weekly News in February 1889

Not so long before there had just been the two old staggers - "Cambridge Chronicle and University Journal" for the Tories and the "Cambridge Independent Press" for the Liberals. Then in 1867 the Reform Act had increased the numbers eligible to vote, most of them urban working class people who were unlikely to be persuaded to pay 2d just for a weekly paper.

The proprietors of the existing papers had held the price despite the removal of the newspaper tax and the way was open for somebody to undercut them. So in September 1868 the "Cambridge Express" hit the streets costing just 1d and offering free and unbiased reporting. It was an instant success and by 1872 was selling 400,000 issues - a number previously unknown in Cambridgeshire newspaper history.

In 1884 the franchise was extended again and 2 million agricultural workers now had the vote. It was a market the political papers could not ignore and in the run-up to the impending election the "Chronicle" issued a new mid-week penny paper the "Cambridge Observer and County Guardian" to give undeviating support to the Conservative cause. It ceased once that party had won the December 1885 election

Early next year the Tories produced a successor. The "Labourers' News" would "expose the hypocrisy of sham friends of the labourer" (by which they meant their political opponents, the Liberals). The new journal cost only 6d making it the cheapest paper in the town.

This was the situation when in 1888 William Farrow Taylor defied all sceptics by issuing a Cambridge Daily News, using the latest technology and selling for only a ½ d. Its aim was to cater for all interests and classes and it would be neutral in politics. It soon caught on and based on its success he launched a new series of weekly papers

Thus it was that February 8th 1889 saw not only a "Cambridgeshire Weekly News" but also a host of other titles. There were Weekly News's for Newmarket, Saffron Walden, Royston and Huntingdonshire whilst Ely had a "Weekly Guardian" and St Ives a "Weekly Chronicle". People were encouraged to buy the local edition which allowed small towns better coverage though based on the same core content. It competed with the established papers in those areas and soon was rivalling the popularity of the "Daily News" itself.

In November 1889 the "Cambridge Express" was put up for sale by its owners. A new Conservative company was formed to take it over and soon the "Labourers News" ceased, urging its readers to switch to the "Express". By 1909 however its circulation had dwindled and amalgamation deals were discussed. The "Chronicle" was approached without success but talks with the "Weekly" bore fruit and the two amalgamated.

The new joint publication was to be "one of the largest and ... one of the best weekly papers in the United Kingdom" said Taylor who stressed its political neutrality and expanded his printing presses to cope with increasing demand.

The hardships of the Great War hit all newspapers; the price of newsprint rocketed, the amount of paper allowed was reduced. The "Chronicle" struggled through, the "Cambridge Independent Press" did not and it merged with the "Weekly" group in 1917. Still independent in politics it was the "Independent" title that the joint papers adopted as they battled for readership with the one remaining Cambridge weekly paper, the "Chronicle" until in 1934 that too became part of the Taylor empire.

There had been other skirmishes throughout the period. Two other daily papers had been published briefly, the "Daily Independent Press" in 1892, the "Cambridge Daily Gazette" between 1898 and 1900. The latter had even produced its own weekly - the Cambridgeshire Weekly Gazette, and the "Cambridge Graphic" had also flourished for a couple of years.

In 1935 the "Cambridge Town & County Standard" appeared on the streets but failed to attract sufficient readers to ensure its financial viability.

In the 1970s new technology and market forces saw the growth of free distribution newspapers and ever alert to a changing world the "Cambridge Independent Press" finally reached the end of another chapter in its history. The title disappeared from newsstands in 1981 and in its place re-emerged the "Cambridgeshire Weekly News" with its sister titles.

Its proprietor had described it in 1909 as "one of the best weekly papers in the United Kingdom". Its modern equivalent was judged in 1988 as not just one of the best - but the very best. Long may it flourish.

Stories from a year - 1890

Cambridge councillors were anxious to expand the boundaries of their town and eyes turned to Chesterton, just across the river but still obstinately independent - though its residents easily crossed into Cambridge and made use of the facilities provided without contributing to the rates.

Suggestions for amalgamation received a cool response; as a dowry Cambridge suggested a new bridge making access far easier than the inconvenient ferries and far closer than the long trudge to Magdalene bridge. There was much local opposition but on a poll of ratepayers the idea was approved and an application for an Act of Parliament to build it (- and another as well, while they were about it) was successful, though the amount of land they could take for the controversial main road across Midsummer Common was restricted to two acres.

In September 1889 operations began; the Engineers appointed were Messrs Webster of Liverpool and Waters of Cambridge, the contractor John Mackay of Hereford. The superstructure was to be of iron and steel with 6 main ribs spanning the river at an angle of 105 degrees given a clear rise above the water of 14 feet six inches. Its main ribs would be wrought iron plate capable easily of taking the weight of two traction engines. Further details were specified - a length of 40 feet, footways of 7 feet width giving a roadway of 26 feet - ample room for the two widest vehicles to pass with ease. It was to use local materials where possible, to employ a number of local men, be completed within 10 months and the cost, including the road across the common would be £10,000.

It was November 1889 when the Mayor of Cambridge left the Guildhall, escorted by ten policemen, to join the Chairman of the Chesterton Local Board, J. Bester, on the site. Together they performed the ceremonial laying of the foundation stone, each tapping it with the mallets and silver trowels that had been presented by the engineer and contractors. Beneath the stone was placed a vase containing copies of the local newspapers, an account of the background to the new bridge, a copy of the act of parliament and a list of the people involved. The speeches over councillors and crowds dispersed leaving workmen to remove the bunting and decoration that had formed the backdrop to the occasion and continue the work of construction.

The planned 10 month construction period became extended to 15 and it was 11th December 1890 before the great opening ceremony could be performed. The proceedings were scheduled to start at noon but council business delayed the departure of the official procession of 13 carriages from the Guildhall by half an hour. They proceeded to the start of the new road where a silk cord blocked their route. Mayor and Chairman formally untied the bow, named "The Victoria Avenue" and - to only feeble cheers from a few onlookers - proceeded slowly towards the bridge.

Here they found hundreds of onlookers, chilled by the weather and impatient at the delay, and another silken cord. Chairman declared the bridge open, Mayor named it and together they pulled at the rope from which dangled a bottle of champagne, intended to smash against the parapet in the traditional way. Sadly it was not to be - the bottle merely swung tamely and eventually had to be hurled by hand. The cheers that rang out were feeble in the extreme, the contingent of police had no disorder to contain except for a restive horse who contrived to break the shaft of his carriage. The official party walked across, then rode across and returned to the Guildhall, having duly declared the Victoria Bridge well and truly open.

They left behind a remarkable monument to forward thinking - a bridge designed before the age of the motor car that was to carry the weight of heavy lorries. By 1986 it was found to be rusting away and in need of urgent repairs which will take as long to complete as the Victorians took to build it. It will cause traffic chaos - but not total chaos - for that second bridge anticipated by the Act of 1889 was finally opened in 1971. Much longer, much wider and much more expensive Elizabeth Bridge will soon have to carry more of the burden of her older sister.

Chesterton incidentally welcomed the Victoria Bridge - but still declined to surrender themselves to the borough and had to be forced into the marriage, kicking and squealing in 1912.

Stories from a year – 1891

Darkness became a thing of the past in 1891 when a Cambridge firm, Baily Grundy and Barrett started the town's first public electricity supply from a dynamo in the basement of their shop in Gt St Mary's Passage. They only covered a small area around Kings Parade and Peas Hill but also charged accumulators for the University labs. Some people believed this was how electricity would be spread to outlying areas with accumulators delivered door to door along with the milk and papers.

The Company also supplied and installed private generators - including one in 1898 at Milton Hall - till recently headquarters of Eastern Electricity and Sir Clive Sinclair. Peterhouse had become one of the first places in the country to introduce electric lighting in 1884 when they installed their own generating plant which fed light to bulbs the equivalent of 10 watts - little better than candle power - with each bulb costing the modern equivalent of over £30. Their enterprise did not find favour with the laundry ladies who used to hang their washing on Coe Fen since smuts from the generating plant got on to their nice clean sheets.

The Cambridge Improvement Commissioners had been quick to appreciate the potential of the new invention and in 1889 had decided to try and provide a municipal electricity supply; almost inevitably chaos ensued and the enterprise failed.

Then in 1892 the Cambridge Electric Supply Company was established. Despite objections by Magdalene College they chose a site in Thompson's Lane and put in large steam turbines which they ran during the hours of darkness. Soon 10 colleges were connected and as business expanded and more consumers adopted the electric light the generators were worked continuously. Cables were laid, transformers installed, and bright ideas flowed - floodlights on Coe Fen allowed people to skate at night. St Paul's and all Saints churches saw the light in 1904 and although the tramway company suggested electrification of their lines and came to nothing the Cambridge Daily News adopted the new technology when in 1912 it became the first paper in the area to be printed by electricity.

By 1927 the spread of a net-work of power cables brought power from the Bedfordshire, Cambridgeshire and Huntingdonshire Electricity Company power house at Lt Barford to the edge of Cambridge, reaching the Observatory on Madingley Road.

Folk hoped competition would lead to a reduction in charges which in 1929 stood at 10d per unit for lighting or an annual service rate of 54/- (£2.70) per year which reduced the price to three-farthings (©p) a unit, making it economical to heat and cook as well.

Nationalisation in 1947 heralded the standardisation of electricity voltage from the 200 volts supplied by the works to the national 240 volt standard; it was to be 1972 before the last of the 35,000 houses had been converted.

As blackouts became the norm during the 1970s Cambridge had no alternative but to suffer; the Thompson's Lane station had closed in 1966, and in 1973 the plug was pulled on the firm that had sparked electrical storm as Bailey Grundy and Barrett ceased trading.

Stories from a year 1892 by Mike Petty

Respectable ladies, daughters and wives of professional men, were afraid to walk the Cambridge streets at night. They were worried not of muggers or criminals but of learned and senior members of the University. Time after time there were stories of how these clerical gentlemen had stopped and insulted them in the most gross and offensive manner, asking disgusting questions and subjecting them to brutal violence, purely and simply because they were walking unaccompanied in the street and did not happen to be known to the Proctor.

The University took its responsibilities for the moral wellbeing of its gentlemen undergraduates very seriously and there was no shortage of young ladies, attracted into the town by the prospect of numerous rich and lonely young men, anxious for female company. The Barnwell area became notorious as a haunt of loose ladies but it was the central streets that were most patrolled by the Proctor and his men.

They were armed with an ancient statute which gave the University power to arrest women "suspected of evil." Once detained they were taken to a grim building on St Andrews street erected as a workhouse in the 1600s and known after its founder as "Hobson's Workhouse". Here unruly and stubborn rogues were imprisoned and the poor set to work, spinning and weaving. It soon became known as "The Spinning House" changing to become principally a prison used by the University to imprison the prostitutes it arrested.

Conditions inside were investigated by "The Morning Chronicle" of 1851 who quizzed ex-inmates. They found it one of the most wretched and miserable places in the country. The building was dilapidated, the walls cracked and windows broken. It consisted of sixty cells about six feet by eight, each furnished with an iron bedstead, flock bed, two blankets and counterpane. There was no glass in the windows and in winter the floor of the cells was often covered in snow. There was no form of heating although new inmates were allowed a warming pan to air the beds if they had not been slept in for some time.

Prisoners huddled together talking, swearing and discussing their profession. . “The was poor ---; when she went in she was as modest a girl as possible for one of her sort to be, and she would blush when she heard any bad language, but when she came out she was as bad as any of us. She used often to say she got her education finished there. We call it ‘going to college’”.

Once detained by the Proctor conviction was almost sure to follow since the Vice Chancellor held his daily court in a private room, with no public or legal representation allowed and only the Proctor and Gaoler present. The former gave evidence, the latter was asked whether the accused had been imprisoned before and if so the case was proved. Sentence could range up to three months.

Not all the ladies accepted their imprisonment quietly; some kicked and screamed, some planned revenge – one even locking the Proctor in one of the cells – others planned escape. One got through the window and fled to her parent’s house at Dullingham. She was re-arrested on a charge of gaol-breaking but this meant the case had to be heard in public and attracted wide publicity – the University actions being likened to those of the

It was possible for the poor to avoid the restraint and humiliation of the workhouse, but it was difficult to do so in Cambridge because of the seasonal nature of much of the work available

The building trade was a traditional source of employment but, as elsewhere, could only be carried on when the weather allowed and was subject to periodic slumps. But Cambridge also looked to the colleges and for months every summer and weeks in the hardest part of the winter, when living expenses were heaviest, great numbers of college servants whose livelihood depended on the University were thrown out of work when the grads went down.

Schemes were set up to encourage the poor to save for the hard days that were to follow. The Post office Savings Banks had opened in 1861 and accepted deposits of any sum from £50 down to one shilling. But many had trouble saving up the twelve pennies needed to get to the minimum sum and although people could save penny stamps there was then a form to be read over and filled in, all in public view – which for somebody not too good at reading or writing was something to dread

That journey to the Post Office could be a chore for a busy mother when she had so little to deposit so groups such as the Prudential Insurance Company had collectors who went round to each house to collect the savings that could otherwise be frittered away. One woman put in £3 by weekly sixpences and during the hard winter when her husband, a painter, was out of work she had enough to pay the rent and keep the family in food, another having suffered chronic indigestion for years put aside enough to treat herself to a set of false teeth

Some of the collectors were University students, though some felt that many of their colleagues were setting a bad example – rich young men released from parental bonds spending money like water, wining, dining and gambling with little thought for the bills that were to follow – bills that could be settled by pater’s cheque, drawn on his bank and by the 1890’s Cambridge had two banks of its own.

One was Mortlock's which had been established in 1754 and developed into a successful business despite great personal scandal. In 1896 the banks amalgamated with Barclays

The second had been founded by Ebenezer Foster, a miller. He started his banking by simply issuing receipts to farmers who would exchange them amongst themselves instead of cash, trusting the Foster name as a guarantee that the bill would be honoured. The bank began trading in Bridge Street but in 1836 moved to the Turks Head Coffee House where security was provided by three junior staff who were obliged to sleep in the bank, one in front of the strong room with his sword by his side. The bank prospered and the business passed down to his sons.

By 1890 the premises were too small and the decision was taken to move. The London architect Waterhouse was employed to design the new buildings and authorised to spare no expense. The construction was undertaken by William Sindall. It was to have a clock tower 100 feet high that would dominate the town centre from its position opposite the entrance to Petty Cury.

In November 1893 the new bank opened with a flourish and although in 1903 it amalgamated with Capital and Counties Bank and in 1919 was absorbed into Lloyds the Foster name is still carved into the stonework. Through the great entrance troop rich and poor alike, undergraduate and college bedder being accorded equal service in a way unthinkable at the time it was opened

This Christmastide much talk will be of the good old days when villagers knew everybody's name, and much thought will be given to the year to come. In Dry Drayton, Bourn and Bottisham parishes now scheduled by developers to be the lucky recipient of a new settlement unpaid councillors – shopkeepers, farmers, policemen will be preparing to spend weeks arguing the views of their residents against the smart-suited businessmen and their lawyers at the forthcoming Inquiry. Meetings will be held to draw up statements and work out lunch expenses for the battle ahead, not for them the £4,000 a day budget of the Developers' legal teams.

In Stretham and Wilburton however the councillors will be able to relax, knowing that their 3 year ordeal is over. Since December 1986 when the bombshell announcement that their area had been earmarked for a new town drew villagers away from Festive whist drives and into a school hall anxious for any scrap of information they had been endeavouring to learn of and comment on the proposals. This Christmas for them the last Government Inquiry will be over, their cross-examining complete, their views at last heard. They have nothing to do but wait for the decision.

This lowest tier of local democracy was established in 1894 by a Government convinced it was conferring beneficial self-rule on the countryside. It was in November and December that year that the first elections were held. Minute books were bought, meeting rooms arranged and ordinary folk debated ordinary issues transferred from the Parish Vestry to the Parish Council.

Mike the date is in RED as I do not know which year you intended this to be.

1895 was the year of the great frost. It lasted from January to March unbroken except for brief thaws; from January 18th to 25th there were snowstorms, floods and north-west gales with frosts of 15 to 20 degrees turning hundreds of acres of flooded land into skating rinks.

It was ideal weather for the sport in which the fenman excelled – speed skating, organised by the National Skating Association, which had been established in Cambridge in 1879. The competitions started in December 1894 but the New brought racing at Littleport where 4000 people assembled to witness the 50-guinea challenge cup for which all the famous names were present. From Cowbit, Southery, Upwell and Whittlesea the skaters came to compete against southerners from Cottenham, Waterbeach and Landbeach. Then there were the outsiders from Walthamstowe and Leicester. There was also the foreign challenge in the form of the famous Hendrik Lindahl from Norway, reckoned to have been the best skater in the world before his marriage to an English lady. He had quit the sport until last year when he visited Littleport as a spectator and was tempted back on to the ice. Then he had beaten James Smart – but this year the Welney man got his revenge only to lose to F. Ward from Tydd fen at the finish.

Two days later they were back when A. E. Tebbitt of Milton became amateur champion but three days later those who travelled from London to witness the Hayes-Fisher cup were frustrated as ice had turned to water at Littleport. Swavesey men quickly telegraphed to report that their ice was suitable and at the end of the month they were rewarded when one of the most successful meetings ever held was skated on the finest of ice seen in years.

The preparation of the half-mile track with a barrel at each end and sides marked by swept-up ridges of snow involved much hard labour with men often working through out the night. Although the fen winter might be severe the work was warm and refreshment essential. One problem was that the beer supplied to keep the spirits up tended to freeze in the barrel and one worker might be delegated to cuddle it to keep the liquid ice-free.

In Cambridge three fields were flooded at Newnham and electric lights installed so that people could flock for the novelty of skating at night. Indeed so many responded that the Arcade Variety Music Hall, in the Old Corn Exchange, Downing Street, was forced to close. Not even Marie Lloyd could compete with Jack Frost.

In 1895 race followed race and the normal programme was soon completed so in February they decided on a special event: a skating race from Cambridge to Ely and back. Interest was intense and amongst those attending was W. G. Grace the famous cricketer. The entry list included men from Cottenham, Kettering, Haslingfield, Coventry and March.

In the event the starting point had to be moved to Bottisham so it was decided to make it a race from there to Ely, back to Bottisham and on to Ely again – a distance so it was said of 36 miles (although subsequent measurement made it something less than 30).

By the time they reached Upware several of the men of unknown reputations had fallen behind but the lead was being closely contested by a group who arrived at Ely in just 45 minutes. Turning back with the wind behind them they increased speed, averaging a mile in 2 minutes 50 seconds they reached the turn in 34 minutes 11 seconds. As they started the final leg the competition was between Albert Tebbitt from Milton, the Amateur champion and H. A. Palmer of Kettering, winner of an International race at Hendon earlier in the month. They skated side by side, fighting every inch of the way as they travelled once more past Upware, beyond the junction of the Cam and Old West and on towards the Cathedral which the winner reached just one minute slower than in the first leg.

In fact there were two winners – for the men could not be separated and crossed the line in a dead heat. Ten others followed them home – just half of the hardy souls who had set off on the greatest race ever held by the National Skating Association.

For the enterprising Victorian a Kelly's county directory was as essential as any modern filofax. The Cambridgeshire edition issued in September 1896 was no less important than those that had preceded it, continuing the tradition of publishing at roughly five-yearly intervals since 1847 - a tradition that was to last for 90 years.

Compiled with the assistance of clergymen, magistrates, clerks, registrars and other eminent officials it provided everything one needed to know. Perhaps the introductory paragraphs were updated less often than they might be but the editors reported that in the fens steam engines were taking the place of windmills for pumping the water from ditches into the rivers and that the wildfowl were diminishing as their habitats vanished. Sedge cutting was reckoned to be one of the few remaining fen industries, a-

Although basket making, mat making and barge building was still continuing. Farmers were increasingly devoting large acreages to new crops such as potatoes with resulting increase in employment and improving the fertility of their land by spreading manure formed by burning lime whilst the coprolite works were said to be a major factor in the local economy.

The bulk of the Directory was devoted to the county's towns and villages. First came a summary of its location and facilities - "Cottenham is a large village and parish four miles from the Histon station on the St Ives and Cambridge branch of the Great Eastern Railway, 2.5 miles south-west from Oakington station on the same line ... Sawston "is lighted with gas, first used in November 1882, the sum of £104 being subscribed for the purpose ... the works erected in 1867". The parish church and nonconformist chapels are described, together with dates of restoration or erection alongside details of the agriculture, soil, acreage and population.

Not content with this Kelly goes on to detail postal facilities and the local school - Madingley's "National school (mixed) with house for the mistress, built 1844 ... will hold 46 children, average attendance 45; Mrs Mary Tennant, mistress". Then comes the directory - first the names of the "private residents (landed gentry) then the "commercial". Caxton's tradespeople included William Cox and Elizabeth Tasker shopkeepers and Charles Simpson harness maker. Villages were self sufficient - most had tailors boot and shoe makers, wheelwrights and blacksmiths together with dairymen, publicans and beer retailers. It can be a fascinating exercise checking their arrival and departure and wondering just how they could all have made their living in a small community and where their premises were situated in the village street

For those wanting a broader view of employment the classified trades section repay study. From "Abyssinian tube wells" (no local representative, though a London firm is featured) to Zinc workers (Mark Turner of 36 Bradmore street, Cambridge) all commercial life is there. Amongst those featured in 1896 were banjo makers (C.M. Wood, 3 Alexandra St), sausage makers (including Swann and Sansom, Sturton Street), umbrella makers (a choice of several in Cambridge with others in Wisbech and Whittlesey) and a waterproof cover maker in Christopher Gall of Lt Shelford. Display advertisements describe their services - Ernest Kett of Newmarket supplies pianos and American organs for cheapness and durability whilst D.J. Smith, ironmonger of Wisbech holds the patent for the "Turnip fly brush for destroying bug, beetle, caterpillar etc on growing crops"

By 1896 there were also a number of names of photographers. Some such as J.P. Clarke, Scott and Wilkinson and T. Stearn well-known, others like David Spencely of Littleport and John Simpson of Chesterton less familiar. Their views of life through the camera lens will provide the subject for a new series of articles with the hope that others can supply personal details of the men who recorded their present, for the future.

Stories from a year - 1897

Another Jubilee! Just 10 years after the celebrations for Queen Victoria's Golden Jubilee in 1887 it was time to start again - this time her Diamond anniversary.

What sort of celebrations should there be this time - and what sort of memorial should the money that was sure to be raised be actually spent on. It was time for another public meeting and for the ideas to be sorted out.

First in the list was Addenbrooke's Hospital - "no institution was of greater benefit to the poorer classes". But how about the District nurses - they looked after the poor in their own houses, a Nurses Home was needed in Barnwell. Surely the children should be looked after - why not rebuild East Road Girls and Infants school together with one of the British schools and make a donation towards a workshop for the Perse School as well. But the Friendly Societies in Cambridge numbered upwards of 500 members - the working men of the town - and needed to expand their Institute, the money would be well spent there and the medical and surgical equipment would have a proper home. Others felt that the Cambridgeshire Rifle Volunteers were a more needy case and needed a proper Headquarters and gymnasium.

Debate raged and in the end it was left to a Jubilee Committee to decide. Their suggestion of support for all the ideas, except the Friendly Societies Institute, prompted more discussion in the press and elsewhere. Why not give the money to the Addenbrooke's Hospital convalescent home at Hunstanton instead. In the end it was decided to support the District Nurses.

Now that was out of the way they could decide how to actually celebrate the great day. There would be two Processions; one starting from Victoria Avenue at 2 pm, another from Queens Road two hours later - this one including decorated traps, carriages and cycles. But the Friendly Societies - who were going to be the central part of the early procession took umbrage - who were the Committee to dictate to them, didn't they realise that there were certain procedures to be followed ... The Mayor apologised, tempers cooled only to flare again when somebody thought that the procession of decorated carriages - a procession of toffs - separate from the working men's parade - would set class from class; either they combined or the Friendly Societies would pull out. This time there was no compromise, one procession was cancelled.

Working classes could however participate in a decorated cycle competition with their own lantern parade and prizes for the smartest costumes and bicycles. This was the highlight of the celebrations, held on the eve of Jubilee day and attracting over 100 entrants, including ladies.

Jubilee day, 20th June, kicked off with a Royal Salute fired on Parkers Piece, a flight of 1,000 pigeons, sports on Midsummer Common with prizes of £3.00 for the winners. Then, to music from the band of the Yorkshire Dragoons, came the Procession of flower-decorated carriages along the Backs, with prizes too for the best decorated lady's and gentleman's bicycle. They joined the procession led by the Mayor and Corporation with the Fire Brigade and decorated tradesmen's vehicles which wound its way through the town, down Hills Road, Mill Road, East Road and back to the Market Place, passing Parkers Piece where a variety entertainment was taking place. A Water Carnival on the river and musical concert in the Guildhall filled the time until dusk when public buildings were illuminated before the great bonfire on Midsummer Common was lit and a gigantic display of fireworks on Parkers Piece brought to an end a memorable day, despite the squabbles that had threatened to spoil it.

Stories from a year - 1898

The death of General Gordon at Khartoum at the hands of the Mahdi in 1885 prompted a national outcry. The victory at the battle of Omdurman "where within sight of Khartoum stained with Gordon's blood the ruthless tyranny of the usurper was crushed for ever and the fair Province of the Sudan was restored to peaceful husbandry & opened to the commerce of the world" (as the Mayor of Cambridge put it) brought public adulation on its General, Horatio Kitchener. He was showered with honours and awards - made Baron - and in November 1898 he was in Cambridge.

His arrival of the 10.25 train was supposed to be a secret but somehow it leaked out. He was greeted by the Master of Christ's college and Alderman T.H. Hills before starting his carriage drive into Cambridge through streets decorated with flags and bunting and a few cheering spectators - the weather was blamed for the small turnout.

At Parson's Court, beside the Corn Exchange, a contingent of 50 members of the 3rd (Cambs) Volunteer Battalion of the Suffolk Regiment were preparing to form a guard of honour for the distinguished visitor. At the due time they marched off to form up on Market Hill. The front of the Guildhall itself was barricaded, the vestibule smothered under palms and plants, the steps leading to the large hall carpeted and drapery covered the unattractive walls. The floor of the Hall itself was covered in crimson cloth, the councillors chairs had been removed from the Council Chamber and placed facing the stage on which was a table bearing a beautiful casket - especially designed by Mr G Munsey, the jeweller, in which lay the scroll conferring the Freedom of the Borough.

Everywhere else was packed with those fortunate ratepayers who had been able to get tickets. They thronged the orchestra and gallery - itself adorned with green and yellow drapery.

Then Kitchener was there amongst them, alongside George Kett, the Mayor whose speech was of great difficulties cheerfully overcome and the glory of the British Empire. The Freedom conferred it was the turn of their visitor - he was flattered - and he did like the casket. Then it was over and he was gone off to Downing College for lunch (though not before inspecting the Guard of Honour).

Whilst Mayor and Aldermen could relax another section of local life were getting excited. For next it was to be the turn of the University to honour the hero. Already Kings Parade was packed and undergraduates had taken their places high in the Senate House - where they found a hose pipe to spray water to cool the temper of distinguished gathering down below, already annoyed by chants and songs such as "The Soldiers of the Queen" repeated endlessly. Cheers from outside announced His arrival, drowning the cries of pain and distress of undergraduates crushed when the great railings around Senate House itself were pushed over by sheer weight of numbers.

Of this Kitchener may have been unaware; he could not miss the sight of one of his former enemies suspended from the gallery which greeted him as he entered the building - a second glance was needed to ensure that it was after all just an effigy. More speeches of praise - this time in Latin (and accompanied by undergraduate comments) - before the procession moved off, his carriage pulled by undergraduates as far as Christ college where a contingent of police could not prevent the crowds surging through.

Kitchener had yet another engagement - at the Union Society before he could relax over lunch. There was no relaxation for the undergraduates or the police as anything that would burn - hand carts, goal posts, fences from the Backs and much of the Christ's Pieces bandstand was ransacked to feed the flames of a Bonfire on Market Hill. Next morning the centre had all the appearance of having been in the hands of a mob, many cart loads of debris being removed from the bonfire site.

Cambridge pulled itself together; Baron Kitchener moved on to other adulation and honours.

No smoking on the premises" was the rule of the Y.M.C.A. in 1899 but it found disfavour with a considerable number of members who decided to petition for the ban to be lifted. The petition was refused and the organisers were asked to resign from the Association. This they did, being followed by many of their supporters. On the pavement outside the disgruntled band discussed their future. They were now free to smoke whenever they wished, they were no longer free to pursue their favourite sport - rowing - and would certainly not now be allowed in the Y.M.C.A.'s boat, as they had planned

Rowing as an Undergraduate sport dated back to 1825 when St John's college boat club was established followed shortly afterwards by the First Trinity. Soon other colleges joined the fray with the Cambridge University Boat Club being formed in 1828, challenging their Oxford equivalents for the first time the next year.

Racing side by side was not possible on the narrow River Cam so they adopted the practice already developed at Oxford, that of chasing each other and attempting to "bump" the boat in front.

This had tragic results in 1888 when an undergraduate was killed when the pointed prow of the chasing boat hit him in the ribs, which pierced his heart.

Four years later came two additional headlines when one of the rowers was lit by lightning during the May Races and the Lady Margaret boat arrived at the traditional procession of boats with only two oarsmen, other members of the crew being "sent down" for taking part in yet another tradition - that of the winning crew setting fire to a boat - not its fine racing shell, but an old one of little value - following the boozy bump supper'. The combination of events led to the abandonment of the procession in which the eights rowed down the Backs adorned with flags and flowers, ending up in a line across the river whilst crowds gathered on the lawns of Kings college to watch – allowed on the sacred grass for this one occasion.

It was not always pleasant to be beside the river for by 1868 the Cam was an open sewer with effluent flowing into it from the Colleges along the Backs, and combined with the smell from the Gas Works was said to improve competition - one had to learn to row fast to get past as quickly as possible.

There was even a tale that in 1852 when Midsummer Common was under some feet of water time races were rowed over the Common - but that one of the boats lost its rudder and shot between the legs of a horse waiting by a coal barge. It is said that the boat escaped without damage but that the horse was cut across its stomach - but whether by the bow or by one of the oars is not quite certain!

In 1868 various town clubs came together to form the Cambridgeshire Rowing Association in an attempt to improve the River. A subscription-list was opened, Queen Victoria gave £100, and agreement was made with the railway for the removal of the old bridge at Chesterton whose span was too narrow to allow boats to pass under. The improvements were much appreciated

All this was no avail to the debarred smokers. They called a meeting at the Mitre inn in Bridge Street on 2nd June and decided to form a club of their own, naming it the "Ninety Nine" to commemorate the year - and a success for the University crew against Oxford after a period of reversals, They entered two crews in the Bumping races that year and soon demonstrated their mettle. In 1903 they ended up "head of the River" - a feat they might have achieved earlier had they given up smoking!

It was a special New Year's Eve, the first of a New Century.

As midnight 1900 approached streets which on 364 nights of the year were solitary and deserted after 11 o'clock were packed. Throughout the town all forms of entertainment both public and private stopped, coats and hats were donned & shoes laced. All feet were heading for Kings Parade, feet of all ages for although the young predominated the middle aged and old were also there. They paced up and down the street while the century hastened to its close and although there was no unnatural solemnity about the gathering there was something in the demeanour of the crowd that proclaimed that it was no ordinary celebration. As the century got into its last quarter of an hour the crowd in front of Deck's the chemist grew even larger. Finally the door opened and the hero of the hour emerged.

Alderman Arthur Deck was one of the grand old men of Cambridge. He had been a town councillor for nearly 50 years, he was and an enthusiastic balloonist but most importantly he was the Rocket Man. The elderly gentleman was greeted by cheers as he crossed Kings Parade to the open space in front of the College and prepared for the ritual that had been started by his father Isaiah in 1820.

As King's clock struck the first chime of midnight a rocket whizzed up into the night sky and everybody waited for the distant explosion and the pretty coloured lights that would follow. Then before the clock had finished striking up went the second.

The Twentieth Century had now officially arrived in Cambridge. It was welcomed with much shaking of hands and exchanging of good wishes, with the singing of Auld Lang Syne and rousing cheers. Then all adjourned to Deck's back parlour where steaming punch was ladled out with unsparing hand and the Alderman's health was drunk time and time again. Arthur Deck saw the start of 1908, but not its conclusion; his rockets continued until 1913, then Dora the Defence of the Realm Act forbade them for the duration of the war. In December 1919 those Cambridge people looking forward to a general return to pre war conditions at the festive season were disappointed to learn that there would be no rockets to signal the New Year. Sometimes, Mr Deck junior explained, the rocket sticks caused damage when they fell and perhaps more significantly the crowd had been rowdy things not to be tolerated in those days. So he had decided that his father's custom must not be his. It seems a pity said the paper "there are many losses we could submit to with less regret than the loss of the rockets and the abandonment of a celebration which was based on good fellowship". It was the end of a chapter, but not the end of the story. In 1922 the custom was revived in response to continued pressure. But it was thought no longer safe to use Kings Parade for the launch and the ceremony transferred to Parkers Piece. Midnight found a thousand people assembled to watch the rockets. But it was not quite the same, numbers dropped off and people found other attractions in the town on New Years Eve. So it was that 1929 arrived uncelebrated by any rockets and one of the most celebrated of Cambridge customs fizzled out.

CWN 24th April 1989

The returning heroes on 6th May 1901 had many tales to tell of hardship and toil, of extremes of climate, long marches and occasional action. Little did they know that their worst danger was yet to come

The Volunteers had responded to the call in January 1900. On the 20th they had assembled for a last breakfast - the town contingent at King's College, the University contingent at Caius. Then they had each marched independently to the station before boarding the same train for a month's hard training at Bury St Edmunds. Finally it was off in the snow on the gruelling railway journey to the Southampton where in a draughty shed they waited without food or comfort for the arrival of the boat that was to carry them across the Bay of Biscay and on to South Africa

Truly they could now do their duty. Armed with rifles and a hundred rounds of cartridges and with rolled overcoats in the tremendous heat they stood their ground as the enemy swept through their positions - trainloads of them, wounded in battles further up the line,

Somewhere there was excitement but the men of Cambridgeshire were getting bored standing guard beside a railway track where the main talking point was a visit from Rudyard Kipling. In desperation they planned an ambush to get themselves noticed at the highest level - and what better than to intercept the Commander's Lady and get her to carry a polite letter to her husband!

Perhaps Lord Roberts responded. At any rate they were soon on the move on long hot marches, interspersed with long hot boring periods of inactivity and the occasional spell of excitement. Sometimes they heard the sounds of gunfire, on Whit Monday they were fired upon by shells and responded with great cheerfulness. They were less happy when ordered to carry the battalion's baggage across twelve miles of hostile country, fighting nature's rivers with only four biscuits as rations

It was September when they really saw action, getting near enough to the Boers to fire their rifles, and three days later in the chief incident of their campaign they captured a hill-top camp all by themselves and held on to it for three days without rations. Had it not been for the sheep they found and the captured wagons of flour they might have gone hungry.

Everything else was anticlimax. More long marches, more waiting, a little more excitement at the turn of the year, and then home. Home by coal truck and cattle boat, home to Bury St Edmunds a day too soon for the great celebrations that Cambridge had planned its returning heroes.

Traffic was banned, shops were shut, and flags flew as the Volunteers both town & gown, now united and in their khaki were escorted by other Volunteers in scarlet tunics before attempting the final march from the station into town. It was prove one of the most dangerous of their entire campaign

Every inch of space was occupied as walls, fences, balconies, windows & roads were packed. Near the Senate House a contingent of mounted police were drafted in to help their colleagues but without avail. In the chaotic crush people were subjected to suffocating pressure and a bandsman was seen fighting for his life, using his drumsticks as weapons.

Somehow they squeezed into Gt St Mary's for a service, thence to the Guildhall where they were admitted Honorary Freeman of the Borough and into a Corn Exchange laid out as a banqueting hall for a meal of lamb, turkey and ox followed by African Gateau and Kimberley Jelly.

Meanwhile the streets of Cambridge saw the traditional "rag, "Mob law on the common and the Market Place" read the headlines over stories of battle, charge and counter charge that resulted in more casualties amongst the participants than had been suffered by the Heroes they had gathered to honour

The Coronation dinner on Parker's Piece took tremendous organisation. There were the tables to find, the food to prepare, the volunteers to marshal and of course the very special guests to be assembled.

Some 2,500 aged poor had to be identified, located, equipped with knife, fork and spoon and transported to Parker's Piece for their outdoor dinner. Eventually the plans were laid and the food was ready. Everybody kept fingers crossed that the weather would hold

A similar meal had been organised for the previous Coronation in 1838; at the start of the Victorian age, Now that age was dead and the Edwardian was about to begin, There was no doubt about it - the 26th June 1902 would show that modern Cambridge could match the loyalty of their forefathers. Sadly it was not to be

The news of the King's illness - some thought it might be fatal - and the postponement of the Coronation shocked the Country. It shocked the Committee, concerned about what to do with all the food prepared for the feast that would not now take place, Hasty arrangements were made to distribute it to the elderly in their own homes before it went off in the July heat

The postponement was a short one and on August 9th the Corporation and dignitaries proceeded to King's College chapel for the celebration service, Then came a parade of decorated vehicles intended to illustrate "Progress" , Boer war veterans processed alongside a float depicting "Africa" resplendent with pythons and crocodiles, monkeys and leopards.

Nearby came the Great Eastern Railway ambulance corps, motor cars and cycles represented "Modern times" in contrast to the old-time coach and four, whilst tradesmen showed their wares with the Co-operative Society displaying a single piece of coal weighing 7 cwt. In all the procession stretched for a mile and a half,

The programme continued with daylight fireworks, a balloon ascent and promenade concert on Parker's Piece and culminated with a grand display of fireworks by Messrs Brock, It was an occasion to remember, but the only food was the public luncheon in the Guildhall and that cost 3/6 (18p) a head,

But on September 4th all that was put right, Tents sprouted on Parker's Piece despite the strong winds that tugged tent poles out of the ground and threatened to cause a catastrophe. Meanwhile dozens of women were buttering bread as it fell from a machine and an engine was heating several boilers each holding 100 gallons of water. The Stetchworth Dairy had supplied 110 gallons of milk and E.A.Wadsworth came up with the ginger beer and lemonade that were to be consumed by 6,000 children rounded up from all the schools in the Borough. They munched their way through 120 stone of bread, 120 stone of cake and 4 cwt of biscuits, watched by onlookers who paid 6d for the privilege.

It was all so reminiscent of the Coronation celebrations for Queen Victoria when 15,000 had been entertained. But that was 64 years before and try as they might the Council could find only 250 residents who had been present on that occasion. But whilst the 1838 coronation had become part of the folklore of Cambridge, the 1902 is forgotten except when somebody discovers one of the official Coronation Medals depicting the King and the Corporation arms distributed to the children at the time.

Stories from a year – 1903

It was Friday 13th February 1903 when fire ripped through Laurie and McConnal's store in Fitzroy Street, opened just 20 years before. The fire fighters rushed to the scene but had no fire engine they could bring – just six hose reel carts stationed at various parts of the town. With no pumping equipment they relied entirely on the poor mains water pressure and quite expected the whole of Fitzroy Street to be devastated. They considered wiring to London for an engine to be sent up by special train, but considered that this would have taken too long.

In the event the street was saved, though the shop was just a mass of blackened ruins. But Mr McConnal was not one to accept defeat. He moved some of the salvaged stock to the garden of the house in which he was lodging, opened a temporary shop in Fair Street, accepted an insurance settlement of £22,650 and set to work constructing a magnificent new building.

One of the other shops in that street was the Co-operative, formed by a committee which had included three shoemakers, a carpenter, odd-job man and some mechanics. They had set up there in 1871 after two years in City Road, taking care to watch every penny – even chopping up the packing cases in which goods were received and selling them as firewood. By hard work they prospered and opened branches in Mill Road and Victoria Road, a bakery in James Street and in 1900 a new store in Burleigh Street.

The advent of the motor bus enhanced Cambridge as a shopping centre which attracted multiple shops and up-to-date proprietors such as Sainsbury, Woolworth and Boots. But whilst these might attract new shoppers to the centre, the old population which had originally supported the small-scale shops in the Fitzroy Street area was drifting away with slum clearance, for by 1952 it was found that 91% of the properties in the East Road area were worn out – over 100 years old and poorly constructed. Laurie's however continued to expand and modernise.

The 1950 Holford Report indicated that the Fitzroy Street area would be a “valuable relief for shopping pressure on the historic centre. But it also proposed a shopping development in the Lion Yard area and released a string of plans and counter-plans. Whilst the City favoured a pedestrianised shipping area, the University wanted more cultural amenities such as a library and art gallery with a regional shopping development based in the Fitzroy Street area – which the City agreed would be a good idea, but in addition to Lion Yard rather than instead of it

Plan followed plan and as the arguments rumbled on so the area deteriorated; a disused pub became a shelter for alcoholics, small shops with low rents and short leases were taken over by small businesses and their new owners added to the debate. Laurie and McConnal continued to emphasise their faith in the area in 1965 by modernising their extensive frontage and in 1970 the Co-op increased its Burleigh Street floor area by 50%

But as parking restrictions were introduced the Co-op pioneered a new form of shopping when in 1970 it established a discount warehouse for people wishing to purchase in bulk – the Beehive – which it opened to the public, winning a planning appeal to allow it to continue. At an inquiry into their second warehouse development they stated “Fitzroy Burleigh is no nearer solution than it was in 1952”.

Laurie and McConnal could not wait. In 1977 they announced their closure blaming planning indecision. Next year Grosvenor Estates entered into partnership with the City Council to develop the Grafton Centre.

As Christmas 1904 approached older folks' thoughts turned to some of the good old customs the modern generation would never know, when Christmas was merry and for a fortnight before and a fortnight after the event there was a constant round of junketing and sleep was very little thought of.

They recalled "Show Night" when all Cambridge and his wife used to turn into the streets and every shopkeeper did his best to make a display of his wares and catch the public eye by some form of novel window dressing. The chief objects of attention were the butcher's and poulterer's where the carcasses of prize beasts and poultry were exhibited in prestigious quantities whilst the proprietors dispensed hospitality to their customers in their private offices or parlours.

But it all got out of hand and in their endeavours to beat one another the butcher's killed more meat than they could get rid of in the ordinary way and losses followed. And then 'sentimentality' came on the scene – people thought it was barbarous and unworthy of nineteenth-century civilisation. The custom died and with it went the art of the butchers' 'windowdresser' of which the modern generation knew nothing. 'Show Night' provided a considerable fillip to trade and provided an opportunity for a great deal of harmless enjoyment and useful social intercourse. There were plans in 1904 to revive it.

The excess meat might anyway be used up in another custom – 'Beef Eating' – a free meal offered by the owner of the hotel or inn to his regular customers who dined well on cold beef and pickles, but paid for their own drinks.

Draws and raffles were also popular. Draw tickets were a shilling each and prizes of suckling pigs, gigantic turkeys, bottles and bottles of spirits were offered by publicans whose takings rose to compensate them for any expense involved. Raffles were organised by shops where people rolled dice for Christmas trees, stands of wool flowers, musical boxes or cases of stuffed birds. Although illegal the police turned a blind eye.

They also turned a deaf ear to the Christmas waits – a band of musicians who patrolled the streets, and to the children carol singers who 'howl Christmas carols and hymns, or their own perverted version on our doorstep and cadge for money – the practice is most objectionable', thought one correspondent.

Another custom which was still present in 1904 were the 'Share-our club' nights. Often these clubs were organised by public houses and working men were encouraged to pay a small sum weekly – perhaps sixpence or one shilling. These were sometimes subject to criticism with claims that for every sixpence a man invested in the club he would spend the same amount in the pub. For his investment a man got eight shillings a week sick benefit if he fell ill during the year with the residue of the funds shared out amongst members at Christmas.

In 1903 a wife sued one club you had refused her husband payment since he was not being given medicine by the doctors and so could not be 'on the club'. When told he was beyond medical care and dying they brought forward their 'share-out' night by three weeks, distributing the funds the day before the man died. There was nothing left to pay the funeral expenses and the widow's plight evoked much sympathy in the days leading up to Christmas

Sultan of Zanzibar

In March 1905 the Mayor, Alderman Campkin had worked hard on his civic duties all morning - a morning when Cambridge was full of hustle and bustle over the Greek controversy - in which the Prime Minister had become personally involved - voting to make Greek no longer compulsory within the University.

Then at two in the afternoon came the telegram - the Sultan of Zanzibar (in London for the coronation) would arrive at the station in 2 hours time and would appreciate an escort around the ancient town and its colleges. What was he to do: the reputation of Cambridge hospitality was at stake for a visit of royalty "even of more or less obscure regions" is a matter of some moment. The chief constable was an authority on the orient but was out of town, the University involved in its own turmoil; it was up to him. He despatched a carriage to meet the visitors - not the official Mayor's coach but the one from the Lion Hotel with one of the hotel waiters as escort.

The Royal party in turbans and flowing white robes descended in majesty from the train but of the Sultan himself there was no sign - "he had been detained in London for an audience with the King". His entourage was escorted to the Mayoral parlour but the party preferred to visit the Bazaar - in progress in the Guildhall - whose worthy stallholders (including one who had spent some time in Zanzibar) were delighted at such wealthy visitors- but disappointed when they spend not a halfpenny.

Then came the tour - to Kings to Caius and Trinity where as the Porters bowed low the Prince fell to his knees articulating his praise for its architecture in a language that none (including the interpreter) understood. This was the only word he spoke - except when one of the party stumbled and stubbed his toe - then it became apparent that some words were the same in English and Zanzibarian

After three quarters of an hour it was time to depart and with many salaams they set off for the station Crowds gathered to watch their departure learned something of the mysterious ways of the Orient when the Royal party suddenly dashed to a couple of hansom cabs, and disappeared at speed towards Hills Road.

Next evening a representative from the Daily Mail travelled to Cambridge with "exclusive" news - it had all been a marvellous undergraduate hoax by members of Trinity College.

It all came as no surprise to the Editor of the Cambridge Daily News who had written only two weeks previously about an incident in 1873 when not only the Mayor but the University officials and Volunteer band had paraded to the Station to welcome an non-arriving" Shah of Persia" - an article which had obviously caught the eye of "The Sultan" at Trinity college. And the Mayor who obviously read the paper carefully had been right in his caution.

Stories from a year: 1905 [CAMBRIDGE VERSION]

In April 1905 Cambridge Railway station became the centre of attraction for at last the lumbering, slow horse-trams would be challenged by new technology - motor buses were here; not just one bus company but two, travelling the same route, competing for the same passenger

People flocked to stare at the two new rival buses, one painted Light Blue- the Cambridge colours, the other Dark Blue - that of Oxford! On the first day 2,000 brave souls climbed on board to make the journey into the centre. An undergraduate recorded his impressions in a poem published in May 1905

Oh, who will not go for a roar and a blow to the station and back to the Square
On one of the two apparitions in blue that the Vac has evolved for us here?
Oh, who would not rush in the Saturday crush for joy of a ride on the top.
Or quiver with pride - and the engine - inside, at the snort and the start and the stop

The "apparitions" were for some an unwelcome addition to the traffic congestion - for already in 1905 probably no other town had as many cars and motorcycles as Cambridge in term time. People soon became worried at the speed and the size of the monsters in the narrow central streets

"Amazes the eyes the Gargantuan size, amazes the hooter the sense,
As swoops on its way in despotic array the Triton of traffic immense
In sooth but a few will remain in the Cury at hearing the omnibus roar
There cannot be space in that limited place for the monster and anything more"

One of the new buses was an open-top, double decker, and from it passengers could see things previously hidden

Oh, bring up your "brown" for a tour of the town, from nine in the morning till ten.
This way for a new and sensational view of Christ's and Emmanuel men!
The rooms where they keep, how they look as they sleep, the muffins for tea that they buy.
The Bridge that they play and the rent that they pay, you can see all the lot from on high!

Environmentalists became concerned about the impact of this modern technology. The buses filled the streets with black exhaust smoke, and the snort of the engine was everywhere

But a Stygian gloom will assuredly loom on the brow of the lover of peace,
That another new noise should detract from the joys that for ever and ever decrease;
And loud is the wail of the bike and the trailer and trap as they scatter afar

Within 6 months the double decker was banned. The single-decker lasted a bit longer before it too was forced off the road - and the slow, safe and solid trams reigned supreme once more. Their triumph was short-lived. In 1907 came another Company - the Ortona - whose direct descendents still ply the Cambridge streets

They have been joined most recently by a new generation of open-topped buses which have prompted exactly the same reactions now as in 1905!

Stories from a year: 1905 [COUNTY VARIANT]

In April 1905 Cambridge Railway station became the centre of attraction for country and townsfolk alike for the lumbering, slow horse-trams were to be challenged by new technology - motor buses had arrived.

Their triumph was short-lived. In 1907 came another Company - the Ortona whose direct descendents still ply the Cambridge streets. Soon they trundled the roads outside the town. Sawston and Cottenham routes were established by 1910. A service to Royston came in 1914 and although the war brought a halt to further expansion the postwar days saw routes to Ely, Linton, Haverhill and Willingham.

During the 1920s other companies were formed

In 1919 the newly established "Whippet" buses from Graveley started a service between Cambridge and St Ives

In 1922 the Burwell and District Motor Services started to serve the east of the county

Cambridge Blue based at Arrington started services to Bedford and Biggleswade

Premier Travel, a partnership of undergraduates, started in 1935 with a route to Royston and although the type of buses have varied - some early pioneers even used coal-lorries which they "converted" to buses on Saturday by adding a row of seats - buses have been part of the local scene ever since. Indeed such is the congestion in central Cambridge nowadays that there are plans to force people to leave their cars on the outskirts and take instead an "apparition in blue" (now called a mini-shuttle)

Stories from a year – 1906 by Mike Petty

In November 1906 councillors held a special meeting on a Saturday morning to pass a special proposition: "To place on record the sincere regret felt by the Committee on hearing the news of the death of Mr. Pink, Librarian for more than 51 years. Their memorial went on to single out his constant care for the interests of the library and the single-minded devotion to duty of this the oldest official of the Corporation.

The young John Pink had been selected as Cambridge's first librarian in 1855: he had been one of thirteen applicants and the 22 year old got the job in preference to a retired stage coach driver, Thomas Cross.

His early days were spent in planning for the opening of the new library in a rented room in the Friends Meeting House in Jesus Lane. The great day dawned on the 28th June 1855 and at first people flocked to the library to consult the books in the room provided but it soon became clear that more was needed. It took three years of debate and planning before a Lending department was established. Readers also wanted newspapers but the Committee were reluctant.

Eventually Pink won them over – he could take them provided they were free. The proprietors of the Cambridge Chronicle and Cambridge Independent Press duly obliged and others agreed to let the library have copies of ‘the times’ and ‘the Daily news’ that were only one day old.

Addition

Pink went on developing – he established the basis of the present “Cambridgeshire Collection” and a library for children. As the service grew he supervised its move into the Guildhall and saw the opening of a domed reading room in 1884.

But John also found great public pressure demanding a branch library in the expanding Barnwell area. A site was offered, the “low roofed tile shed made as comfortable as possible” and in 1875 it opened. Pink was allowed a new member of staff to run it but it was soon apparent that the new librarian was as fond of the public house as the public library and was dismissed for intoxication.

By now it was obvious that the building was in the wrong place and it was time to find a new site. In 1897 after considerable problems the new Mill Road library opened and was heavily used “by many of the poorest and some of the roughest classes”. But with the new library the old Barnwell branch could be closed – or so he thought. The public outcry was amazing: a petition was circulated calling for it to be kept open but neither the Library Committee nor the whole Borough Council was impressed and the library closed in June 1897.

It was not the end however, for in September a public meeting was held calling for its reopening. Local newspaper letters pages were inundated and Pink was drawn into the debate angering the logic of his case. It was a debate he was to lose for eventually the matter came before full Council once more and they gave in to the public pressure, reopening the old building as an evening reading room.

Thus John Pink learned that it was easier to open libraries than close them – a fitting testimony to the public appreciation in which his work was held then, as now.

Stories from a year – 1907 by Mike Petty
Compiled 11.9.1989

It was, said Gwen Raverat a kind of water-borne cart or floating wheel- barrow". She was referring to the garden punt that the children used for playing pirates and other water games. Engravings show Undergraduates in similar craft obstructing the commercial trade on the Backs in 1792.

Perhaps St Johns college students might have had a better result had they chosen to use one when they stole one of the balls from Clare College Bridge about 1897. Instead they used canoe and sadly the weight of the stolen item was such that their craft capsized

The garden punts bore little resemblance to the elegant slim tourist punts of today. These arrived in force in 1907 and proved tremendously popular; the previous year there had been hardly a punt available and before that, said "Table Talk "such a thing was not known in Cambridge. Yet this summer every boatyard possesses a flotilla

They were readily adopted by a number of punt hirers including Dolby, Strange, Bullen, Scudamore, Reynolds and Banham. The latter, an eminent boat builder modified the original design, making them shorter and more easy to handle in the crowded Cam, They were redesigned again in 1967 by Scudamore as the "Camford", Other modifications have followed though some ideas, such as the fibre glass punts introduced in 1961 proved unsuccessful.

Whilst Chauffeurs can now be hired to overcome some of the problems of punting on the Backs the more hardy visitors making the voyage to Grantchester can sometimes wish for protection from childish misbehaviour. Although river patrols have been instigated nobody has as yet suggested fitting shotguns to the punts. Yet this was precisely what the old fenmen did.

Their punts were sixteen to twenty-two feet long and used for wildfowling. From the front projected a massive punt gun. As he neared the flock the stalker would lay flat on the bottom of the punt, his legs stretched out on either side to steady it and a small stalking stick in each hand as he manoeuvred into position. The explosion from the mighty muzzle loading gun could leave dozens of wildfowl dead or dying. One gunner recorded that a single shot killed 20 widgeon in January 1947.

Three months later at Haddenham other fenmen were punting into their own homes, heads bumping against ceilings as they sought to salvage something from homes flooded by the bursting of a river bank. The landscape might not resemble the beauty of the Backs but never was "a waterborne cart or floating wheel-barrow more appreciated.

It was old-fashioned Christmas weather snow, snow and more snow. The only problem was that it came at Easter,

In 1908 Easter fell at the end of April and people laid their plans, remembering the enjoyment of the previous year when temperatures of 70 degrees in the shade had tempted hundreds of railway excursionists to the beaches of Hunstanton. People at Ely claimed that the old legend had come true and that "The Sun had danced on Easter morning; those up early enough might have witnessed the phenomenon (due no doubt, they said, to radiation since the sun, did shine very grandly after it rose but gave way to blizzards and ended up with vivid lightning and the roar of distant thunder at nightfall,

Nevertheless many awoke on the Monday hoping against hope that English climate would revert to the previous year's pattern. The reality was very different; they found the rooftops & ground carpeted with a couple of inches of snow with more large flakes falling, The fens lay covered to a depth of four inches whilst Huntingdon measured twelve inches and pronounced it the worst snow since the famous Easter storm of 1876

Traffic was disrupted although few actually went anywhere - the railways carried just 54 to Great Yarmouth, 75 to Huntingdon races and a scattering to Bury St Edmunds or Bishops Stortford, Only a few took the longer excursions to Bedford, Oxford or Scotland. Everywhere trips to the country or down the river were abandoned and those brave enough to venture into Cambridge itself did so with the certain knowledge that some wit would be sure to wish them Merry Christmas,

Then at midday the sky cleared & the sun shone. Cambridge people were not to be fooled however & stayed in front of the fire – only to find the temperatures continuing to rise. At

Ely a mini-boom of visitors climbed to the top of the Cathedral tower for a glimpse the snow-clad landscape

The impending cricket season was attracting attention, as was the young cricketer returning home from a successful trip to Australia with the M.C.C. A smoking concert was arranged and many turned up to witness the presentation of an inscribed gold watch to Jack Hobbs

Perhaps summer could not be far away after all. But in 1908 it was to be May before the thaw came & the young folk of Milton had to be lifted over large snow drifts before they could attend their village feast

April has seen snow in other years, including 1903 and 1978, in 1912 it was the month of a record drought, and in 1918 of the highest floods since 1879. But at a time when modern headline-, are of impending climatic change it is perhaps worth recalling a comment from 81 years ago. "The English climate can not and will not be regulated ... no reliance is to be placed upon it"

Stories from a year 1909

Early in February 1909 the Committee were busy pursuing the same old problem they'd pursued before lack of parking spaces. Since 1888 there had been a "defence fund" set up to pay fines incurred when drivers were summonsed for "loitering about the streets". But still there was no answer. There were just too many licensed cabs for the available spaces. If all the hackney carriages in Cambridge plied for hire at the same time then every rank would be full and there would still be 50 horses and vehicles wandering around the streets unable to find a place to rest. But of the 213 licensed cabs the majority were kept in livery stables and only brought out when ordered leaving just 50 vehicles in vacation and 70 in term time to ply the streets. The Committee found that most of the authorised ranks were largely unused; hardly anybody wanted a cab in Drummer Street or Victoria Road, whilst Queens Road and Grange Road were usually deserted. Of the 50 spaces at the station most stood vacant except at the beginning of term. The traveller returning to Cambridge by the last train would often find the rank deserted except for Phil Stocker, whose horse was acknowledged to be the slowest in town. His death in 1917 left only "lame Walter" Mansfield plying his trade, a character so loved by his regular customers that when his old cab failed to pass its inspection in 1912 they'd rallied round to buy him a new landau. At the turn of the century the hansom cabby had been king of the streets. With his shiny top hat cocked rakishly over one ear, a bunch of violets in his buttonhole, thick double seamed overcoat buttoned closely around his portly form and a pair of stout driving gloves "Gentleman Joe" on his dickey was a great personality. The arrival of the motor taxis in 1908 hit them badly but many passengers confessed they would prefer to sit behind a spanking good 'gee' than the bald, uninteresting back of a chauffeur. The cabs themselves might sport rubber tyred wheels for a smoother ride but one passenger who jumped into his seat too heavily found himself running down St Andrews Street when an old tin tray which had been placed over a large hole in the wooden floor gave way under his weight. Today's modern motor taxis are much more comfortable and reliable but none of them can boost their takings like one old cab owner. He used an former circus horse which had been taught to rear up on his hind legs to say "thank you" for any tip received an act much appreciated by his customers|

Stories from a year – 1910, by Mike Petty

Cambridge has a habit of doing things in twos; in 1888 an act of parliament allowed the construction of two new bridges, in 1905 two bus companies started operating and in 1910

two groups built their own aeroplane. Both consortia included a member of the Wallis family.

One was a biplane constructed in Chesterton by four young scientific instrument makers called Knightley, Booth, Miller and Wallis. They hired a large barn in the High Street and by May their aircraft – a glider – was virtually complete, ready for display during May week. The machine was virtually all their own design, though they had taken one idea from the Wright Brothers. It was held together with 3,000 brass screws and was to be launched from Royston for trial flights. If successful an engine would be fitted.

More successful was the steel-framed Wallbro machine with its 25hp JAP engine built in St Barnabas Road by H.S. and P. B. Wallis. By July it was ready for flight trials in a field near Abington; it rose a few feet from the ground and sailed along for 3 or 4 yards before coming down nose first and somersaulting. The pilot jumped clear and was uninjured, the machine was picked up and exhibited next month at the Mammoth Show when over 6,000 paid to see it. It was destroyed shortly afterwards when its hanger collapsed but recreated in 1981 helped by the detailed technical notes that had been published in the Cambridge Daily News in 1910.

Meanwhile Huntingdon was preparing for the opening an Aviation Race Course, on Portholme Meadow, witnessing its first flight, by a Bleriot monoplane in April 1910. It was August 1911 before a man flew over Cambridge itself and October when the first plane landed when Second Lieutenant W. B. Rhodes Moorhouse became lost en route to the new Huntingdon airfield and came down on Parkers Piece with an empty fuel tank.

Public interest in flying had been heightened by reports of the activity in an Oakington farmyard where in 1909 two well-known aeronauts had been building a monoplane in a bid to win the prize of £1,000 offered by the Daily Mail for the first circular mile flight by an all-British aeroplane. Its constructors were A. M. Grose, the first person to have been granted a motor drivers licence, and N. A. Feary, a native of the village. It was powered by a specially designed engine by a Northampton company, the propeller was by Handley Page and the chassis constructed by H. V. Quinsee of East Road, Cambridge. As the day of the flight neared the partners argued over who should not be the pilot – one had a family, the other a widowed mother to support. The first trials were with the machine tethered to a stake but then it was let free, careered across a field but only became airborne when it hit a bump.

But the grand pioneer of local aviation had been E. P. Frost of West Wrattling Hall who as early as 1867 had started to invest £1,000 and ten years in the construction of a flying machine with flexible wings that would flap up and down and lift it into the air. It needed a 25 horse power engine but in those days there was only steam and the power was not available. By the time a petrol engine came along thirty years later the machine, left under trees in the park, was a total wreck.

Airplanes with flapping wings seem totally illogical today but so does the autogyro – a mini helicopter featured in one of the James Bond films. Yet that does fly and was developed by a company registered in 1975 at Chesterton Road – almost inevitably by another member of the Wallis family.

Stories from a year 1911

"Why are there so many hard working men on the scrap heap, living a life of degradation and misery"? These were the sentiments of an Aberdeen man, one of the first to use the newly opened Labour Exchange in Guildhall Street in 1911. His quest for work had been unsuccessful.

Through the hardships of the 1920s and 1930s soup kitchens were opened to soften the pangs of hunger and the Town Council initiated a series of measures to find work for the unemployed. The sports facilities on Jesus Green, and the paving stones along Queens Road are testimony to some of the job creation schemes initiated.

Roads were constructed to serve the soon to be developed acres off Cherry Hinton Road and long delayed schemes reassessed. One of these was the revival of a project to relieve traffic congestion in Silver Street and make better communication with Newnham that had been long mooted indeed the need for such a route had been voiced at the opening of Victoria Bridge in 1889. There was great opposition with nine separate schemes drawn up in 1923 and "if not for the urgency of the unemployment position we should be in the same position today, only instead of nine there would have been nineteen". Such was the opinion of the Mayor in December 1926 when the Fen Causeway was formally opened. It had given employment to 90 men over a two year period.

By 1932 Cambridge was reported as responding to a Government appeal to sell gold, jewellery and trinkets to help the national financial crisis. "This is the time to spend buy new clothes, furniture or extra food. Have your house decorated or painted. A prompt response to this appeal will lift thousands of homes from misery into happiness by Christmas". The Cambridge Master Builders took out an advertisement to emphasise the problem: "Do you realise that 1,653 able bodied men are totally unemployed in your own town. Do you realise that of this appalling total 543 men are of the building trade"

The suicide rate rose, despair continued and the International Situation became graver. But during the War years the unemployment situation lessened due in part to 'Butlins' the 'in' name for the Government Offices established at Brooklands Avenue which boosted Central government employment by 350%. In 1959 the Employment Exchange was moved there from Newnham and reported that there were only 340 men and 67 women unemployed in the area, compared to 1,400 in July 1938. "All out drive to lure workers to pricey Cambridge" read the headlines in 1973 sentiments repeated almost exactly today. Shops have difficulty attracting staff, firms move away and leaflets are distributed in Lion Yard begging for workers. The windows of the Job Centre now once more in Guildhall Street are full of positions, but not for the Scotsmen on the benches in Lion Yard who still experience the degradation and misery bemoaned by their compatriot 87 years ago.

28.8.1989

In a room at Trinity College plans were laid for the annihilation of thousands of British troops. Soon 130,000 enemy soldiers were landed at Great Yarmouth and Lowestoft and were heading inland. Cambridge took it all very placidly – watched the officers start off in their motor cars, and chatted to the men in the bar of the Lion Hotel. It was after all just a paper exercise with Sir John French and his cronies returning nightly to the peace of their college. It was September 1907

Within a year the troops were real and the area patrolled by cavalry. 150 passed through Cambridge and a squadron spent the night on Grantchester Meadows, another by the side the Witchford Road at Ely, yet more in Withersfield Road, Haverhill. A country policeman found eight in full uniform with hats and spurs, their horses tethered by their side, lying dead to the world, fast asleep. Meanwhile the invading Irish Hussars fought inland from Colchester. Again Cambridge did not panic – it was just a military exercise.

In 1910 the German army swarmed ashore at Kings Lynn and conquered Lincoln. The King issued a proclamation imposing military control throughout Cambridgeshire as the invaders swept south. This time Cambridge fell and a fierce battle raged from Helions Bumpstead to Kelshall, fiercest around Elmdon where British trenches were more than once captured by the Magdeburg battalions only to be hurled out again by the Coldstream Guards. By noon the magnificent palace at Audley End was in flames and desperate fighting was taking place in the streets of Saffron Walden. The timely arrival of General Packington's force from Pottun proved decisive; despite a final cavalry charge the Germans were slaughtered, swept out of existence by a terrible cross fire. By nightfall there was no unwounded German south of Whittlesford, except as a prisoner. The Battle of Royston was hailed as a great victory in the Daily Mail of September 10th 1910.

But this too was a fictional war, recounted in a novel by William Le Queux to point out the likely impact of such a real invasion, a story that so impressed Field Marshall Lord Roberts that he added a Foreword. The book was written in 1906, next year French planned his invasion and in 1912 all the preparations were tested properly.

The area selected was that part of the country "which should invasion take place, will assuredly witness a life or death struggle between the defenders of the country and the invaders". Thus Newmarket, Royston and Linton were again the scene of great activity, of route marches and cavalry charges, airships and artillery. This time the invaders were led by Sir Douglas Haig, while Sir John French directed the manoeuvres from his base at Trinity College. There the guards on the gates were for real, with bayonets fixed, when the King came to see for himself the progress of a realistic – but phoney – war in September of 1912.

In September 1914 the troops on the commons told their own tale, but as for 1939 well only time will tell if this time the war was for real or just another exercise in September sabre-rattling

By May 1913 Cambridge was quite used to the call of votes for women. Generally the struggle for the Parliamentary vote was conducted by serious political lobbying and debate, but such meetings passed largely unnoticed whilst the more extreme "Suffragettes" made the news.

Cambridge's first experience of such protestors came in 1908 when in what the male reporters described as a "very exciting" incident one struggling female had to be carried out of a meeting - they would soon find out that Cambridge was not a congenial place for this sort of activity.

However 1910 saw a visit from the leading militant, Mrs Emmeline Pankhurst who was greeted with hostile demonstrations. 1911 saw women walking the streets to avoid being counted on census night and a local minister's wife being arrested during a suffragette raid on the House of Commons. In 1912 the University Men's League for Women's Suffrage was lobbying on their behalf and the Conservative Women's Franchise Association was formed but it was the militants who hit the headlines in May 1913.

Early one Saturday morning two plain clothed policemen spotted smoke coming from a newly-built houses in Storeys Way, The new motor fire engine roared off from St Andrews street, followed shortly afterwards by the firemen, some cycling, some running and some riding in a covered van. They were too late to save the roof of the first house but did manage to prevent serious damage to the second.

Detective Sergeant Marsh was set on the case. He discovered somebody had broken in through the study window, poured paraffin over sawdust and packing cases and set them on fire. They had then moved to the adjoining premises and repeated the process. There were three clues: bloodstains from broken glass, footprints and a ladies gold watch. On Wednesday he travelled to Norwich and arrested a schoolteacher.

The suspect, an active Suffragette, admitted being in Cambridge on the evening in question and she had a fresh wound on her hand. The crucial evidence was the watch, a present from her uncle, a Norwich policeman. She was sentenced to 18 months hard labour but went on hunger strike and was released in October.

Meanwhile other Suffragette outrages continued to hit the headlines; they tried to set fire to the Varsity rugby pavilion. They landed by boat at St Johns College to paint the gates purple, green and white and daub "Votes for Women" on the stone work. They disrupted a garden party at Magdalene College and generally caused such mayhem that Colleges closed their gates during the Long Vacation.

Meanwhile the ladies of the Union of Suffrage Societies prepared to welcome a contingent of women taking part in a Pilgrimage to London in July 1913. Their march was heckled as it made its way past the colleges the "suffragettes" had terrorised and an attempt to address the gathering on Huntingdon Road was shouted down. But the large numbers who turned out were left in no doubt as to the success of the occasion, and all were content that they had helped to break down some of the prejudice created by their militant sisters.

What a time to be a boy!

August Bank Holiday 1914 meant the Mammoth Show – not so “Mammoth” as once it had been, but still exciting. There were athletic sports, side shows, dancing and fireworks, even a balloon ascent. But that day there was something better – following the crowds down to the railway station to see the first of the Naval Reservists off to the War.

The station was crowded with boisterous farewells between relative and friend, so there were no tears, only shouting and laughter, and when the train finally drew in there was singing with most of the people joining in. The train doors were slammed shut, embraces hastily given, hands shaken and promises made to be home by Christmas; then with shouting and waving, and chanting about the boys of the bull-dog breed, the naval reservists were off. Jack Overhill watched them go and wandered home.

Soon Cambridge got quite used to seeing the khaki uniforms as the Territorials mobilised. Appeals went out for extra men to join the Royal Army Medical Corps – the first Eastern General Hospital – quartered in one of the large rooms adjoining Corn Exchange Street and soon to be based at the Leys School before moving on to Trinity College.

Some were not happy of course. Farmers were worried that the Army would take their horses, grown-ups moaned about the soaring prices – butter up 2d a pound, bacon now 1s. 4d (7p), and shelves emptying rapidly as panic buying set in.

But the Boy Scouts were being prepared. They could help the war effort in a number of ways – distribute notices, help in soup kitchens, look after the families whose men were at War, and – more excitingly – assist despatch riders, (especially in the way of puncture mending), pick up despatches dropped from aircraft – and watch out for spies!

One morning came the rumour that there were soldiers on Coe Fen, Jack Overhill dashed off to see. There stretching away to the far end of the Fen was a row of white bell tents. Parallel with them, over the middle ditch, were horses and wagons. As there were no sentries he could wander amongst them, peering into the tents where soldiers were sitting and lying.

Somebody said there were more on Midsummer Common and off he ran. He'd never seen anything like it. Soldiers, horses, tents, wagons, limbers, guns – there was hardly room to move. The men were washing, shaving, cleaning their boots, belts and buckles, grooming, cooking.... doing all the everyday soldierly things that fascinated youngsters and their parents.

Everybody turned out to look and marvel. Local folk brought pails of water, hot meals, cups of tea, apples – anything; hawkers did the same but charged extortionate prices. Jack made friends with two of the lads, learning the words to It's a Long Way to Tipperary that they played on the mouth-organ and listening to their chatter long into the summer night. It was a great time to be a boy!

One morning he ran down to the Fen to find grass, trees, and sky. Soldiers, horses, tents and wagons had vanished. They had come in the night and had gone in the night.

Stories from a year 1915

Cambridge Antiquarian Society is the most senior of the groups who have an interest in the area's past. Its meetings and its prestigious "Proceedings" comprise contributions fully researched by specialists and usually devoted to topics such as Anglo Saxon cemeteries, Roman Burials, iron age swords or Victorian stage coach routes.

In January 1915 Catherine Parsons was speaking on witchcraft but this time she was not dwelling on the past but speaking of the present the life and feelings of her Cambridgeshire village where witchcraft was very much alive.

The parishioners had told her there always were witches and there always would be and they truly believed she was in league with the Devil and had the power to do evil. To make the contract the Devil usually appeared to the person in the shape of an animal such as a rat, mouse or toad. Once recruited the witch became possessed of imps or spirits which lived upon her body and unless given plenty of work to do became a terrible torment to their owner.

Villagers sometimes spotted one of the imps in their house "it looked something like a mouse with very large eyes and a tail only two inches long, and as soon as it was spotted it scrambled away up the chimney to report what it had seen to the witch". The local rag and bone man chased an imp she had sent to spy on him "but the faster I ran the faster he ran till that got to her cottage, where the witch stood, she quickly caught it up and put it in her bosom they always carry them there, or under her armpit she takes them to church with her".

Superstitious people ascribed various powers to the wise woman and generally went out of their way to stay in her good books. People believed they were safe provided the witch did not possess anything that belonged to them but how could they be sure she had not picked up a piece of your broken crockery or taken a spring from the garden hedge, just enough to give her power.

Witches were extortioners and their craft remunerative; she could put a spell on your dough so the bread did not rise or on coal so it would not burn. She could influence animals, making horses stop dead in their tracks, pigs go off their feed, and cows stop giving milk or even send swarms of fleas to bite her victim.

Villagers had various remedies to protect themselves "you go to the village shop and buy a halfpenny worth of salt without saying please or thank you for it" ... "you put a piece of steel under your doormat for a witch cannot cross steel, and a knife under the chair will stop with witch sitting down".

Eventually a witch got old and longed to be at rest. But, it was believed, she could not die until she found somebody to take care of her imps. "When one was dying nobody could stay in the room with her because of the sulphur which came from her nose and mouth and she wouldn't have died except for the nurse witch told her not to open a certain hutch she kept in the room, but the old nurse would not listen she looked in and there was a red underskirt the imps was wrapped up in it and escaped!" Sometimes the witch tried to burn the imps by putting them in a hot oven, "but they screamed so loud they had to be taken out and were returned to the witch ... eventually they were put in the coffin and buried with her". On another occasion "it was as much as two strong men with pitchforks could do to keep the imps from bursting the oven door open and the men were terrified by the strength of the imps who screamed and cried like a lot of little children".

The folklore of Cambridgeshire is full of tales of witchcraft, modern newspapers carry contemporary stories, but few can match the details given by a respected historian to an audience of Cambridge academics some 74 years ago.

Storied from a year – 1916 by Mike Petty

"We have bombed the town of Cambridge" all its factories are useless, lying now in smoking ruins". Thus came the news from Berlin.

It was expected. The Red Cross nurses from Wordsworth Grove had been alerted, stretcher bearers called for. Meanwhile the other patients, convalescing from operations had been tucked up safely in their beds whilst bandages and scissors, lint and slings and dressings were prepared for use.

Outside the night was peaceful – just the sound of running water from the weir and the river, or a distant hoot from a motor horn. The scattered stretcher-bearers in their dark and cheerless posts were getting cold and hungry, whilst in the Hospitals nurses piled up fires and warmed up coffee. The night dragged by and dawn was approaching when the field Marshall dismissed them all and they turned home in the early hours of April 1st, thinking it had been a hoax. Yet the later German communiqué implied that Cambridge might have been a target after all.

The first-hand account of the raid that wasn't was recorded in the Wordsworth Grove "Monthly Magazine", the first issue of which was published in January 1916. The articles, poems and jokes capture something of the atmosphere of the Convalescent homes which tended the wounded and maimed after their surgery at the first Eastern General Hospital in Burrell's Walk. Under the administration of Commandant Alex Wood its staff catered for 30 patients at a time, organising dances or theatre visits, river trips and even band concerts, using the talents staff and patients alike. It was just one of many such Hospitals opened during 1915 in anticipation of the casualties that were to be expected. Others were based in "Huntley", Herschel Road and at 2, 3, and 4 Cintra Terrace, Hills Road, which had originally treated wounded Belgian soldiers. The three houses were old-fashioned and inconvenient so they had transferred to St Chad's in Grange Road, a large house with sunny room and delightful garden.

In the surrounding area various large houses such as "The Firs" at Histon, "Mount Blow", Shelford, "Old House" Swavesey and the "Park House" Balsham were made available by their owners. They were supplemented by Parish, village or church halls in Fulbourn, Willingham, Shepreth, Whittlesford, and Cottenham, whilst for a time the Union workhouse at Linton was pressed into use. Between them they treated over 21,000 patients until disbanded in May 1919 whilst 80,000 were transported from the station to the various hospitals without mishap.

Transport of another nature is featured in the first magazine with a poem entitled "The wreck of the Sunbeam" recalling the adventures of a soldier who borrowed Sister's bicycle to explore the town. His adventure ended with the machine wedged beneath the wheels of a car and no amount of repair could salvage anything from the wreckage. In fear and trembling he approached its owner.

"They rushed downstairs to view the wreck
A sorry sight to see!
She turned away with curses low,
Then bathed the hero's knee!"

In August 1916 the King saw for himself some of the care bestowed locally on wounded soldiers and, 5 months later, the Zeppelins did arrive over Cambridgeshire and bombs were dropped. It would appear that little damage was done but without copies of the Wordsworth Grove magazine one cannot be sure since details were censored in the official press – and who would believe the Germans following their April claims!

Stories from a year – 1917 by Mike Petty

By 1917 the Great War had dragged on and the costs had rocketed. In January they were estimated at £5.7 million a day. But the real cost of the war was not money but men – patriotic appeals from volunteers were now being supplemented with compulsion. Throughout the country local tribunals were established who had to decide who could be allowed to stay at home for essential local duties - a terrible responsibility for its members – one of whom resigned when his own son was refused exemption. Others took it more stoically.

John Henry Sadler was called before the tribunal – he was 32, married a thatcher spent some time vermin killing and chimney sweeping. The exchange is reported verbatim.

"What were you doing yesterday?"

"Mole catching sir because they destruct the crops, I skinned 40 moles last night after I had my tea" (laughter).

"Moles you had by you"

"No, they were all fresh ones." Sadler also stated that he had a brother who was a Prisoner of War.

"That is why you should go and fight the Germans – I am afraid you will have to join up".

"I am sorry to hear it"

Often farmers appeared on behalf of their men. Charles Wright appeared for George Dimock, a 39 year old married man with 6 children, and for Arthur Nightingale, a horsekeeper. Wright stated that since they had taken two of his men some 30 acres had gone out of cultivation – what should have been wheat was nothing but thistles and grass. He was worse off than any other farmer for labour since he employed more single men than others. He lost his case. Albert Wright, aged 19, applied for himself. He was a smallholder and carter who farmed 9½ acres on his own as well as working for other smallholders. He had lost his left eye when working as a blacksmith's assistant and been advised to take up agricultural work. He was one of the hardest working lads in the village and was granted conditional exemption.

Although a formula was produced allowing so many men per head of cattle, the impact on food production was severe, and newly formed agricultural labourers union protested about the need for Sunday working – when munitions workers were given the day off – and wages – what was the use of giving labourers 25/- per week when inflation meant it was only worth 14/6. The proposals that young girls might be trained for milking and feeding cows – “turned from domestic employment on to a farm to work among boys and men without any supervision” met with opposition from some quarters. Many of those granted exemption were required to join the Defence Force where they were trained to guard the home front and be ready to prevent invasion. Should the Germans land on the East Coast it would be essential that men and munitions be deployed as quickly as possible, yet road links were poor. Thus in 1917 soldiers were employed to construct a new road between Stretham and Wicken where locals anticipated the benefits that would accrue to their village whose large greens would be certain to prove irresistible as camping ground for passing cavalry. The road was duly completed – but scarcely used since nobody could decide who should pay for the bridges across the Old West and cam rivers – and therefore not built.

Strict controls were brought in over foodstuff and an eight year old boy sent to prison for 14 days and whipped for stealing bread; people were urged not to shoot pigeons – they might be carrying important messages.

But the real carriers of important messages were the postmen. After every new assault his progress down the village street would be watched carefully. Time after time he would stop and deliver the letter that people dreaded receiving – that a son or husband was wounded, dead, or – worse – just “missing”.

Stories from a year 1918

It was Christmas in Cambridge and people who had been fighting for the future were spending as if there was no tomorrow. Nobody could begrudge them having a bit of a fling but caution was being urged. Money would not be coming in so easily very shortly; the emergency munitions works in Cambridge were all shutting down; several factories had given notice that they would have to reduce staff and when demobilisation came it would mark the end of the separation allowances which had been providing regular income into many homes. It all went unheeded. Never had there been more people in Cambridge than on the Saturday afternoon before Christmas.

The principal streets were absolutely crowded, the shops congested. From a trading point of view it was the best for many years and several shops were completely cleared out.

But where were the raisins for the Christmas pudding, the abundant shiploads of apples, the light foreign wines that were to turn thoughts from the unobtainable whisky. These and many little comforts and luxuries which had been alluring held out to the British housekeeper had simply failed to materialise proving once more that the profiteer was too strong for the controller.

For this was 1918; the armistice had been signed, the rejoicings on Market Hill had taken place only a week or so before, and already there was news of returning husbands and sweethearts. Cambridge itself was full of soldiers and sailors home on leave. Meanwhile all but 600 of the wounded from the First Eastern General Hospital across the Backs had been sent home on 12 day passes. The remainder were fully entertained in the wards made as bright and attractive as possible with decorations much in evidence.

Addenbrooke's Hospital was also transformed; Chinese lanterns, evergreens and chrysanthemums decorated every ward and "festivities of extraordinary gaiety" planned. The presence of soldier patients shattered in nerve and body made the civilian patients, both male and female, who were lying ill in bed feel much more thoroughly that there was much to be thankful for and as they thought of the men in blue and what they had gone through their own ailments became light in comparison. Nature too joined in the celebrations with an aurora borealis on Christmas night which lasted for some hours and attracted considerable attention.

The northern sky glowed with a ghostly radiance and at times great shafts of pearly light lit the night sky like the rays of a searchlight, reminding some of their experiences on the Western Front.

All this was seen and reported by vigilant newspapermen. Nobody took much notice however when a returned army chaplain, Eric Milner White, started a new sort of carol service at King's College. He adapted the idea that had been begun at Truro Cathedral in 1880 with nine carols and nine lessons read by various officers of the church beginning with a chorister and ending with a bishop. It would, he said, symbolise the link between Kings and Eton, the goodwill between University and Town and peace within the whole Church at Christmas time.

Ten years later the BBC broadcast it for the first time; they continued even during the Second War when the Chapel glass was removed for safe keeping, there was no heating and for security reasons the name of the Chapel had to be kept secret. This year the Saturday afternoon tills will ring a little less frantically as millions throughout the world stop their shopping to celebrate with the congregation in a Cambridge chapel a Christmas tradition with its roots in wartime.

Stories from a year – 1919, by Mike Petty 24th May 1990

In April 1919 Homerton College became the venue for the first Rally of the Cambridgeshire Girl Guides. By then there were 31 Troops throughout the county with Guides established in Linton, Harston and Bottisham as well as Cambridge. Here the first group had been established in 1911 to cater for the aspiration of a few girls who had been inspired to become Girl Scouts by seeing the activities of their Brothers.

The Boy Scout movement in Cambridge had started at a meeting in the YMCA addressed by General Baden Powell on 21st February 1908. It was followed by a public meeting at the Perse school the next month following which "monkey patrols" of boys were formed, playing at scouting without being under any proper control. These were soon formed into Troops in Cambridge, Cherry Hinton, Chesterton and at the Higher Grade and Perse schools. In May 1910 200 scouts were inspected in the grounds of the Perse school and a meeting inaugurated the Cambridge Boy Scout Association. Later 125 members of the local troops made their way to Windsor park for a Coronation Rally where they were inspected by the new King, George V. The excitement of meeting the King could surely only be equated with that of seeing the hero of the defence of Mafeking Robert Baden Powell himself.

Yet in 1911 he was at Cambridge. It was a bitterly cold day and the wind howled across Parkers Piece where 400 scouts assembled before marching off with cyclists and mounted scouts in the rear to the University O.T.C. ground where the great man inspected them. At the sound of a bugle call the apparently empty field became filled with scouts, saluting their Chief with their staves, Zulu fashion, and shouting their patrol calls. Further rallies followed in 1912 and 1913*, but then came war.

In July 1914 a mixed group of scouts left Cambridge for camp at Lt Downham. They camped on a splendid site on a hill overlooking the rich Fenland. They explored the great Cathedral, gave a display at the village fete, were inspected by the Principal of the Ely Theological College, and listened to the rumours of War. As soon as it was declared they started keeping a night watch, sent messages in Morse code to Littleport, 4 miles away, and gave a concert for the local troops. Then came the telegram from General Baden Powell, ordering them back home.

Next day they struck camp and marched to Ely station, arriving just behind the Ely territorials then leaving for Ipswich. Anxious women, standing at cottage doors were heard to ask: "What are they going to send those little chaps to the front too?" Whilst they did not leave for France they did play their part, guarding bridges during the passage of troop trains and guarding the water tower and pumping station at Isleham though what, some asked, could they do against German spies trying to blow them up.

In June 1915 the Perse troop joined the Volunteer Training Corps in a military field exercise between Cherry Hinton and Gt Shelford, attempting to penetrate a defensive cordon thrown around Cambridge. Next year "Wolf cub" packs were formed and in 1922 they succeeded in ambushing the Chief Scout himself at Queens' college in June 1922. B P was en route to present Kings Badges to a number of senior scouts when a large group of cub scouts leapt over the wall of Cloister Court to surround him and reaffirm their pledge "Achela we will do our best".

In November 1917 the Cambridge executive committee passed a resolution allowing girls to attend social evenings but only if chaperoned by their mothers. That has now changed but both Guides and Scouts continue to offer the youth of the County a challenging and rewarding alternative to television and boredom. |

When Lazarus Marsh retired in March 1920 many were pleased to see him go.

His career had started in 1875 and since then he had poked and pried into the seamy side of Cambridge life ending up with a reputation of one of the town's top crime busters. For Lazarus was a 'tec a Detective Sergeant in the police force.

His reminiscences published in the Cambridge Chronicle omitted much of the more serious crime that had occupied the police during the period of his employment. He did refer to the "Jack the Ripper" threats that had been prominent in 1888 but drew a veil over the controversy that surrounded the University's imprisonment of young ladies they suspected of "walking" with undergraduates, powers that were transferred to the police in 1894. Perhaps he smiled when he remembered the appointment of the first women constables in 1918 in response to complaints that girls were "ogling" soldiers.

Marsh would have known the new Police Station erected on the site of the University's "Spinning House" in 1901, and would have followed with interest the council debate in 1910 on whether to give police a day off each week no came the reply, it would cost 23/7 (£1.18) a week more and could not be afforded.

Like others of his profession he would be accused of heartless and brutal violence every November 5th "inhuman monsters who dash hither and thither" in the attempt to restore peace on a night shattered by fires and explosions.

He may have shared the private agony of the policeman who recognised the watch dropped amongst the ashes of a Storeys Way house burnt by Suffragettes as being the one he had given his niece a clue that led to her imprisonment and subsequent hunger strike.

As a young constable he might have participated in the security escort for a suspected Saffron Walden murderer transferred each morning from the County Gaol to the station en route to his trial in 1903 or, ten years later, helped with the case of the Spiritualist who shot his two children and then committed suicide "so that the family could be reunited with his dead wife".

His memoirs recalled his first case burglars who cut the back from a safe in Huntingdon Road to steal the silver it contained, but who took too long over it and missed their escape train. Marsh nabbed them on the platform.

Often he travelled by train himself, warning undergraduates about the activities of card sharps, two of whom he once caught just outside the police station in St Andrews Street and bundled them in through the door with the minimum of inconvenience.

Other crimes needed much more time. Hours of observation caught bank swindlers living in Chesterton and the hardened London villains who found Cambridge a happy hunting ground for bicycles could never rest easy once they knew that Marsh was on their trail.

Lazarus won many commendations from magistrates and villains alike during his 45 years service, he retired to his gardening. "Offending weeds", said the paper, "would receive the same close attention that he has given for years to the worthless growth which has endeavoured to feed itself on society".

Stories from a year 1921

As the bugler played the last post some of the village lads demonstrated their Freedom of Speech in noisy conversation; others exercised their Freedom of Action by riding their Japanese motorcycles noisily past the war memorial.

"We will remember them ..." but the lads have never known that 118 sons like themselves had left their village for France in the early years of the Great War.

Week after week the local paper was full of familiar faces that would never be seen again; by September 1916 12 had been killed a number that was to treble. Two who had been home on leave that June were dead by then, a sister was told in November that both her brothers had been injured one was lying wounded in a Gloucester Convalescent Home, no body knew where the other lay his body was never found.

The news filtered back. Private Joe had lost his left eye, Corporal Frank was killed during an assault when a bullet hit him in the heart. Heber wrote home "I am again out in the trenches ... just as we were going after the Germans a shell exploded in front of me and knocked me back in the trench and buried me ... mates with shovels got me out". His name appears on the memorial, his luck did not last.

Then in July 1919 a public meeting was called to consider a suitable way to commemorate the 38 men killed in action. Various forms of memorial were considered; the Territorial Association was unable to supply a Field Gun but could offer two German machine guns they were declined. Instead the village collected £170 and erected an obelisk of grey Cornish granite.

On Armistice Sunday 1921 it was unveiled in the cemetery by the Member of Parliament in the presence of the whole village together with a contingent of the local British Legion and three clergy Free Church, Baptist and Methodist ministers, none of them village men. There was no representative from the Church of England, nor was the Rector present despite the fact that one of the names inscribed on the memorial was that of his son.

In July 1922 another war memorial was unveiled, just eight months after the first. The MP was there again, the speeches of sadness yet pride were again heard. The same buglers who had sounded the Last Post at the Cemetery repeated their mournful call, this time in the Churchyard.

Throughout the county similar battles were being fought, squabbles over where memorials should be placed, their design and the names of those who should be commemorated divided communities and were hotly debated by parson and people.

Now in 1988 the deep feelings which split the village in 1921 are forgotten at the United Service. A solitary poppy decorates the Cemetery memorial whilst in the Churchyard people assemble to pay homage to the names from two Wars inscribed in stone but now fading away. And as those who have grown old remember those who did not the trumpet note drowns the carefree banter of a Sunday afternoon in one Cambridgeshire village.

Stories from a year 1922 by Mike Petty

In January 1922 the death was announced of Mrs A. A. Moyes, the proprietress of the Lion Hotel in Petty Cury. Her demise would be mourned far and near for, it was said, there is hardly a civilised country in which there cannot be found many people who had at some time or other received kindnesses from this skilful and courageous lady. To generations of undergraduates she was a good friend, indulgent to the extravagances of youth but firm and capable in preventing lapses into hooliganism. Townsmen remembered the interest she took in their various enterprises and agriculturalists her ready sympathy in all their undertakings.

But those who would cherish her memory most were the Belgian refugees of 1915 to whom she showed the care and devotion of a mother.

She had first come to prominence as landlady at the Bath Hotel which on her marriage came under the joint management of herself & her husband, an enterprising caterer. Their menus for public dinners set the fashion for Cambridge and the Bath market dinner was the talk of the county. Various societies made the hotel their base, including the Cambridge Cycling Club whose smoking concerts were copied by almost every other club and institution. The amateur and cottage garden societies which were just beginning to flourish also found it a suitable place to meet – all testimony Mrs Moyes ability to please. As the success grew so it became apparent that more space was necessary; by now a widow she was contemplating extensions when in 1894 she was offered the opportunity of taking over the Lion, following the death of the proprietor, her late husband's father

With her departure from the Bath a chapter in the social history of the town closed. Now she started to make the Lion an institution. Under her rule it grew famous, particularly as a Commercial Hotel and the headquarters of visiting sportsmen and athletic teams. Each visitor was made to feel that he or she was the only person the hostess delighted to honour - so they came back time and again. The old Inn Yard was covered with a glass roof and the rooms became shops for travelling salesmen who laid out samples in the yard were buyers from the big stores come to inspect the goods that were despatched by rail. The practice died out with the increased use of the motor car. These vehicles were having a profound impact on Cambridge life as the Royal Show held here in 1922 demonstrated. Many people came in their cars and went home in their cars, rather than stay the night in the town

Neither such developments, licensing difficulties or physical ill health could quench Mrs Moyes' enterprise or check her enthusiasm. She was urged by friends to retire and take a well-earned rest but instead she continued and died "in harness". Her daughters continued the business.

While motor cars might reduce the visitors to the Lion Hotel it was realised that somewhere would be needed to station the vehicles. At the rear of the hotel a number of wooden outbuildings - stables, smithy, bottle store and laundry - stood around a former bowl green now no longer needed for its original purpose. These buildings were gradually demolished to provide car parking space. By 1950 over 80,000 motorists were using the Lion Hotel yard and the Council were planning a ramped car park - or should it be an underground car park - the inevitable debates continued

In 1961 in the single largest property transaction the city had seen, the Hotel was purchased by a property company. Two years later the hotel closed, though the bars remained, and the demolition men moved in in 1968. They briefly reopened the old courtyard for the development that perpetuates the name of the hotel that the Moyes family made famous

The Mayor was adamant he would not do it, and nor would the Mayoress for that matter. Civic duty was one thing, this something completely different. So he turned to his fellow Councillors on the Commons Committee this was their chance to make a piece of Cambridge history not one of them dared. So in desperation he had turned to his friend, Councillor Symonds. But not even he would spring forward to salvage Cambridge pride. The 1,500 people assembled for the occasion Aldermen, Borough Surveyor, Chief Constable and County Coroner amongst them would witness the opening of Jesus Green swimming pool without the traditional spectacle of seeing the biggest big wig jump in.

But why should they choose this, of all sites. Speaking through his megaphone he rehearsed the benefits that had been debated so fiercely it was in the centre of a large number of schools and the children would now use it rather than jumping into the river which, with its sloping bed, mud and weeds, was dangerous.

The new baths were 300 ft long and 40 ft wide and ideal for water polo ... By putting them near Jesus Lock they were able to get a natural flow of water from the river, which would constantly keep the water pure and clean without the expense of pumping. Not all were convinced there were those who thought them unsightly and others who were adamant that it was wrong to take up common land for such things.

This argument had dragged on and on although an Act of Parliament in 1894 had given power to enclose parts of such lands, and the Mammoth Show was regularly held on Jesus Green, with fences being erected around it to keep gatecrashers out.

Then in 1913 the Council had agreed to turn Jesus Green and Lammas Land into recreation areas which meant abolishing the ancient rights for people too keep their cattle or horses on these stretches of grassland. Now the opposition almost overshadowed the other Great War a war which saw the commons filled with the tents of the military, artillery parked on Coldham's Common, bayonet practice on Butt Green and drilling on Parkers Piece.

In 1922 another Act of Parliament increased the Council's power over the common lands they could now restrict grazing on Lammas Land and Jesus Green, they could legally built the swimming pool on grass which some considered sacred. Surely it was a small price to pay for such a welcome amenity.

But councillors were also faced with other problems including the great growth of motor traffic, and the need for a new road to Newnham to relieve pressure on the central streets. Nine separate schemes were then being discussed but the obvious solution was to push a route over Coe Fen. Opponents argued that such a road would be ugly and would spoil the amenities of the area – it was "some monstrosity they had conjured up" but to no avail, a public inquiry in February 1924 was to find in favour of the scheme and the road opened in 1926. That was also the year that a new sports pavilion opened near the new swimming pool. Jesus Green was now truly a fine recreation ground and the old Mammoth Show was finally given its marching orders – perhaps in this motor age it was just too common.

Crowds packed Cambridge Market Square in April 1924. They had come to hear the Kin, but he was not there. However, his voice was and the speech he made when opening the Exhibition at Wembley was broadcast over the new wireless system.

Cambridge was already aware of the wonder of wireless. Two years before at the Royal Show held at Trumpington a local company had set up a demonstration, only to find its reception interrupted by the voice of a pilot of a cross-channel biplane who was commenting on the weather in somewhat "blue" RAF language.

William George Pye was not dismayed. He had started up in business making instruments in 1896, the year that Lord Rutherford transmitted the first radio signals from the Cavendish Laboratory to Madingley Road observatory. But it was the drop in the scientific instrument market in 1921 that encouraged him to switch to the production of wireless receivers.

His trade was given a boost with the beginning of public broadcasting at the end of 1922 and more and more people were attracted by the new technology. Pye, however, could neither afford to mount a major advertising campaign nor meet the demand it might attract so it was left to Harold Pye to leave his home in Grange Road and distribute leaflets to cycle shops, electrical retailers and garages in his bull nosed Morris Cowley.

Receivers were in their infancy and the Cambridge Daily News started a series of articles instructing its readers in the use of the equipment. Many built their own and were rewarded by the crackles that came through their earphones.

By 1925 the "Mammoth Show" committee launched an appeal to provide Addenbrooke's Hospital with a headphone at every bed and many would have listened three years later when the King's College carol service was broadcast for the first time.

Pye continued to flourish, adopting the "Rising Sun" design for the front of their sets in 1929, and much later pioneering stereo sound and the transistor radio. It was Pye too who demonstrated the first Cambridge radio station at the Royal Show in 1960. Six years later the city Council decided not to bid to be one of the first BBC experimental VHF stations.

Proposals for a Commercial radio station were aired in 1971 and Cambridge Free Radio started pirate transmission but it was to be July 1980 before Hereward Radio broadcast local news from its Peterborough studios.

In May 1982 BBC Radio Cambridgeshire went on air for the first time to be followed this year by the Histon-based CN, FM one of whose presenters, David Hamilton had himself made news in May 1974 when his live broadcast for Radio One was cut short as his punt was attacked by some 300 young rowdies.

Fewer turned out when the new station broadcast from Market Hill recently showing that radio may reach thousands more than in April 1924 but cannot match the excitement of hearing voices from the air for the first time.

Stories from a Year - 1926

The General Strike of May 1926 found Cambridge divided. In the “Red Romsey” area across Mill Road bridge railwaymen stopped work, and in the True Blue central Cambridge undergraduates did likewise. The University gave time off studying for any that wished to respond to the call and keep the country going at this time of need. And as the time of need coincided with the time of examinations many were only too happy to oblige.

Over 2,000 students took the opportunity for work experience in professions normally denied to men of their breeding. Upper-class gentlemen could be found working as labourers at the docks in Grimsby, maintaining the peace as Special Constables in London, or keeping the wheels of transport rolling. On the Tubes, on the buses, lorries or trams the Cambridge accent could be heard.

Some could fulfil every schoolboy’s dream and play on the trains. It was imperative that the trains be kept running so that food supplies could be maintained – and also so that undergraduates could be despatched to the places where their services as strike-breakers were in demand. Many however travelled by car with daily convoys leaving the Backs and heading off to all points of the compass. Others found work nearer home.

Whilst the Baptist and Methodist churches on Mill Road, Cambridge, opened their doors to local striking railwaymen, a Chesterton town councillor made his way to the station and on the first day of the strike found himself driving a locomotive to Sudbury. His companions on the footplate included a number of undergraduates. One was the son of a former chief of the Conservative Association, there was a member of the Macintosh toffee family, Lord Hinchingbrooke from Huntingdon, two rowing Blues, a White Russian émigré and the son of a Newcastle manufacturer.

A newspaper correspondent joined two undergraduates from St John’s College for a trip on the footplate, one stoking the furnace whilst the other kept watch with the driver for obstructions on the line. They found the work dirty and hard, and the twelve-hour shift was somewhat different from their usual labour at college. It was all good fun.

The strikers found their fun in cricket matches on Parker’s Piece, in sports on the Rec and a concert in Romsey School. They also found great amusement when an engine went off the rails in their own heartland near Mill Road Bridge. Hundreds of strikers turned out to mock and chaff at the students’ misfortune.

Then came the tragic news of a fatal accident at Bishop’s Stortford where a good train had rammed a passenger train waiting at the platform. The impact lifted two carriages off the track and smashed the station awning, two men waiting on the platform were killed.

The strike was soon over, the Unions beaten. Some local railway strikers were victimised, as was the one engine driver who had reported for duty. For the students it was the end of a great adventure; they had been to places and done things that had given them a new outlook on life – but the dreaded examinations were still waiting for them.

In January 1927 a daughter telephoned her mother. Nothing unusual about that, except that the caller was 300 years old and was speaking from America. In the first Trans Atlantic telephone call to be received in Cambridge President Lowell of Harvard University spoke to senior members of the University of Cambridge including the Master of Emmanuel College which numbered amongst its old boys the John Harvard after whom the American college was named Newspaper correspondents reported the thrill of the occasion akin, they said, to Columbus sighting land. They commented on the technical feat involved, the call travelling via Boston and New York, then "through the ether" to Rugby and finally down to the switchboard at the Cambridge telephone exchange in the usual way. Reception was somewhat "mushy" but nothing worse than was often experienced in domestic calls. Much of the conversation reflected the formality of the occasion, an exchange of greetings and ideals but once others joined in more mundane matters were discussed. It was Sir Ernest Rutherford who introduced the inevitable topic of the weather informing the New World that in the Old it had been snowing.

Though they had spanned the Atlantic in 1927 the Post Office experienced great difficulty getting through to Sandringham in January 1936. As news that the King's life was moving peacefully to its close journalists flocked to the Norfolk estate. They chose as their base the Feathers Hotel at Dersingham, its one telephone together with the one outside kiosk their only means of communicating the news to the Empire. Engineers immediately set about providing the extra lines needed. Heavy snow had blocked all roads, the AA advising that no driver, however skilful, could force a heavily loaded wagon through the surrounding drifts. Undaunted the Post Office made it. Round the clock they struggled to string cables along hedgerows, loop them over cottage roofs or tie them to trees or electric light poles. Soon there were thirteen telephones to be shared amongst the ninety reporters. The technicians watched as the body of their King left Sandringham on a gun carriage without pomp or pageantry. By the time they returned to their digs the story had travelled around the world.

The hard work involved in erecting telephone lines has been recalled by Ernie Gill in his marvellous unpublished memoirs of life "From muck spreader to Mayor". In it he describes his part in erecting new wires between Cambridge and Norwich in 1919, sweating with pick and shovel throughout a long working day then cycling home at night.

The earliest recognised telephones in Cambridge were installed by the South of England Telephone Company in 1892 based in Alexandra Street and taken over by the Post office in 1912. However the honour of owning the very first telephone in Cambridge was claimed by an Undergraduate at Pembroke College in 1878. He fixed up two between his 'diggings' in St Andrews Street and a summer house at the bottom of the garden. The little retreat was an excellent place for an illicit game of cards and the telephone allowed his landlord to give warning of any approaching Proctor.

Stories from a year – 1928 by Mike Petty

In July 1928 the Cambridge Preservation Society was up in arms over a Council plan; the Cambridge Drawing Society was also adamant that their proposals would be tantamount to turning a most ancient area into "something like a concrete tea garden".

The site under dispute was derelict; the two ancient mills that had stood side by side facing Mill Pool for 900 years had been swept away the previous year without much murmuring. They were obviously obsolete once Ebenezer Foster had erected his new steam mill in Station Road.

Before the advent of steam it had been water power that turned the mill wheels of the three watermills on Mill Pool. Two shared the same roof; one called the Bishop's Mill had belonged to the Abbot of Ely at the time of the Domesday survey, the second known as the King's Mill had been erected shortly after. A third, just across Mill Pool at Newnham and formerly known as Mortimer Mill still stands.

Elaborate arrangements had been devised during the centuries to govern which mill had first call on the small amount of water that tumbled into the Mill Pool. In 1566 it was decreed that the King's Mill was the most important. No other Mill could operate until it had started or continue after it finished. The adjacent miller could well see what was happening but the miller at Newnham had to be warned by blowing on a horn or sending a runner to give him notice. All this must have been most annoying and in 1634 that the Newnham miller encouraged some boys to blow their own horn so that he could start work at his own convenience.

The power of steam brought the era to an end. First a steam engine was installed making the Mills less dependent on water power – a facility featured by the Auctioneers when the property came up for sale in 1842. Both were acquired by Ebenezer Bird Foster who bought the Bishop's Mill outright and leased the King's from the Corporation. But then came the second steam invasion – the railway – and Foster erected new mills in Station Road, though he renewed his lease in 1879 for another 40 years.

By 1911 motorists were urging a better road link to Newnham and somebody suggested a new bridge across the Mill Pool. It would mean demolishing the old mills and the Corporation bought out Foster's interests. Inevitably the scheme collapsed and the premises which were old and dilapidated could not be relet and became derelict. After 15 years the University suggested a swap for land they owned in Corn Exchange Street, the council preferred a case deal and the University offered £2,500 for the site.

As negotiations dragged on so the Mills got worse and in 1927 the old buildings were demolished. Somebody thought it an ideal place for a new mortuary but then Messrs. Reynolds and Scudamore applied to buy it for a boat house. In the end the Council decided not to sell but to erect a boat house themselves, reconstruct the sluices and slipway and construct a weir and footbridge.

It was the suggestion that the ancient arches through which the mill race had roared for centuries were to be swept away that caused the Artists and Preservationists to rise in anger. Plans were redrawn and the archways retained.

Once more the Mill Pool is packed with craft but now punts jostle where once seagoing boats loaded the flour produced with the aid of the water that still thunders as it had since before the Colleges were founded.

The Great War brought with it the threat of invasion. It was feared that the Germans might land on the East coast and that there would be need to transport men and munitions speedily from the Midlands to the Coast. The Military sprung into action and built a fine new road between Stretham and Wicken to replace the previous droves that were the only link. Once Wicken was reached the route to Soham and beyond was already well established. Wicken people rejoiced at the prosperity the new road would bring its fine village greens would make excellent staging posts for the cavalry and probably mechanised troops would pause there as well. Yet the great new road brought no great increase in traffic since nobody could decide who should pay for the fine new bridges that would be needed to cross the Rivers Old West and Cam. So nobody built them until the war was over and the battle of words finally resolved. Yet there was another approach from the west along the river bank to Upware, crossing at the ferry by the "Five Miles from Anywhere No Hurry" inn. In this isolated corner of fenland Cambridge undergraduates had in 1851 established their own "Republic" with its own President, Minister of Education, Interpreter and State Fiddler. Its members included young men later to make their names in life such as Henry Arthur Morgan, subsequently Master of Jesus college, Samuel Butler the author and a certain James Clerk Maxwell, famous Director of the Cavendish Laboratory in whose honour the world's scientists journeyed to Cambridge in 1931. Once the Republic has ceased a "King" arose to take its place a muscular fellow who delighted in defending his title against all comers, be they coprolite diggers from the adjacent villages or bargees carrying commodities along the lodes to Burwell, Reach or Wicken. The area was undrained and unspoiled, a haunt of wildfowl and fish, but even then the drainers were working on the last of the great meres, Whittlesey, converting the wetland to dry lands. A steam pump had been installed at Upware in 1821, soon that whole area would also be tamed. But just next door at Wicken the wetlands remained and in 1899 part was presented to the National Trust. Now other Cambridge students of botany and moths rather than beer and music would surely find the habitat preserved for study. Yet in August 1929 the night sky was illuminated, not with candles to attract moths but with flames that were searing through the dry sedge. The wind kept it away from the village but sent it deeper into the fen. Soham fire brigade were soon on the scene, to be joined by those from Cambridge but as darkness fell the scene of wild grandeur was visible for miles around. Cars and cycles brought onlookers to the scene but in the fen itself the steady work of the fire fighters, beating out the flames was winning. By midnight 9 hours after it started the danger was over. Seventy acres one tenth of its area was now merely black wasteland but the black peatland that surrounded it was safe and soon the swallowtails would be back, as would the botanists to study and the visitors to gaze on this last area of untamed fenland.

On 4th June 1930 the headlines were full of tragedy; three undergraduates were dead, one killed by his own pistol, the others by an Ortona bus. The common link was a motorcycle and a yearning for excitement.

Two Pembroke undergraduates, one a double-barrelled young man from Midlothian, the other a Swiss citizen, left Cambridge shortly after 3pm en route for Ely on their Norton motorcycle. They headed, "hell-for-leather" said one witness, down the Milton road and past the new £579 council houses that the Corporation were selling off in weekly instalments. The dust they kicked up settled on the wide green verges that had been laid precisely for this purpose. As they neared the level crossing they found the gates closed but turned up the throttle even more.

The crossing-keeper gave evidence that he always followed instructions and kept his gate closed to road traffic. He had seen the Ortona bus approaching from Milton but could do nothing to speed his journey until the two trains he was expecting had passed by. Anyway buses had to get used to delay. Nothing however need stop the motorcyclist since there was always the underpass on the right-hand side of the crossing. And down the tunnel the undergraduates roared, shooting up into the sunlight on the other side.

It was then that the bus driver saw them. He had already sounded his horn put out his hand to signal that he was keeping to the upper road, and was approaching at 12 mph when the Norton leapt out from the tunnel and smashed into the front of his bus. There was nothing that could be done except call for the police. Both students died instantly.

The third lingered for four hours before succumbing from his gunshot wounds, the policeman he murdered outlived him by half a day; his tutor was already dead.

The young man was always eccentric, had a reputation for being clever and was reading history. He also played the drums in a jazz band and had hired a grand piano which he kept in his room at Kings. Unlike most of his college he wasn't rich or famous, he hadn't been to Eton, and he didn't have the finance to maintain the lifestyle he adopted. He wore garish sweaters and plus-fours, claimed to be a Russian prince and ran up debts.

He also stole a pistol, teamed up with a friend from Fitzwilliam, changed his name and spent the merry month of May touring Cambridgeshire pubs in a second-hand car. When the money ran out they traded the car for a motorbike and set off for London where they found excitement, glamour and company in the flat of a girl named Madge. She worked in a nightclub, had a heart of gold and seemed used to strange young men popping in for a while. By the end of the weekend she knew these two were different. They obviously had money problems and had written to Cambridge for clothes they could pawn. They also had guns.

When they went to collect the parcel of clothes they found two men waiting who invited the runaways to return to Cambridge. Their escort were fellow undergrads - after all there was nothing that a little chat could not sort out.

As luck would have it the Kingsman met his tutor in Trumpington Street. The two strolled off to sort things out over a glass of sherry in rooms in the Gibbs building beside the Chapel. A third figure followed. During their friendly chat a knock came at the door. The plain-clothed policeman had just started to read out his warrant when the first of five shots rang out, hitting him in the shoulder.

When the gunfire ceased the Police had a murdered colleague to bury with full honours, the College a famous explorer to mourn and the University had lost three undergraduates in a week._

Today one side of Cambridge Market Square is a jumble of scaffolding and steel as work proceeds to rebuild the north east corner for a new shop. 1931 saw similar development but then they were building what has just been demolished the Victoria Cinema. It opened in September with 1,500 guests and contributed to the Golden Age of cinema indeed in 1931 10,000 miles of film were projected in Cambridge cinemas alone laid end to end it would stretch to Hollywood and 5 million patrons could be accommodated in the four principal cinemas.

The cinema had first come to Cambridge as part of Tudor's circus in October 1896; shortly afterwards films were shown in the Guildhall and the Corn Exchange. The first regular shows were held in the YMCA lecture hall and the Working Men's Club; Sturton Town Hall and the Roller Skating Rink were amongst the venues but the first purpose built building opened in Mill Road in 1913 Although the films in those early days were silent the cinemas were not. First there was the musical accompaniment which varied from a single piano to the eight piece orchestra at the Central Cinema. Then there would be the sound effects cocoa nut shells for horses hooves and a drum to represent canon fire in the popular newsreels about life in the King's army although the operator was not always quick enough to keep up with the action. The deaf were at no disadvantage in the silent movie days many of them could lip read and were better informed than the rest of the audience though this had its drawbacks and one party of deaf and dumb children were quickly ushered out of the Playhouse in Mill Road when their teachers realised they could understand too well just what the shell shocked victims of the Battle of the Somme were silently mouthing. And then there would be those who could hear but not read very well and would insist on repeating the sub titles very loudly to the great annoyance of the rest of the audience.

The Talkies arrived in Cambridge in August 1929 with the musical 'Broadway Melody'. Some thought it just a novelty that would soon wear off silent pictures offered a haven of peace from the rush and turmoil outside. Most agreed that their music was very pleasant though they deplored the all dominant American accents. As the developments continued first one cinema then another was erected and rebuilt. In July 1931 the Rendezvous in Cambridge was destroyed by fire there were more customers for the new Victoria. Subsequently the Vic was restyled in 1952 in a "eurythmic" design "designer, architect and illuminators combining to make a symphony of shape, colour and tone". New and modern projectors came in 1967, a second screen in 1972; it recovered from a fire in 1983 but rumours of redevelopment were persistent and it closed in 1988 Today all that remains of The Victoria is memories and a 1931 facade held together with steel

Stories from a year: 1931 county variant!

Today one side of Cambridge Market Square is a jumble of scaffolding and steel as work proceeds to redevelop the south east corner for a new shop.

1931 saw similar development but then they were building what has just been demolished the Victoria Cinema. It opened in September with 1,500 guests and contributed to the Golden Age of cinema indeed in 1931 10,000 miles of film were projected in Cambridge cinemas alone laid end to end it would stretch to Hollywood and 5 million patrons could be accommodated in the four principal cinemas.

Of course you did not have to come to the towns to see films, many villages had travelling cinemas. Thurston's the fair people took their Electric Vaudeville to Soham and perhaps this is what prompted 'Nick Knack' Taylor to convert his coach builders workshop into a permanent cinema there in about 1912. It was one of four cinemas to function there at one time or another.

At Burwell the Gardiner Memorial Hall was used for film shows soon after the Great War, its popularity waning when the Doric opened at Newmarket in 1937. At the time it was reputed to have the biggest balcony in East Anglia, outrivaling the older Kingsway and Victoria cinemas which also stood in High Street

Ely's first film shows were held in the Public Rooms although the Electric Cinema in Market Street opened about 1912, followed by the Majestic in Newnham Street and in 1929 by the Rex Littleport filmgoers could choose from the Electric Cinema, (later renamed the Cinema Theatre and The Empire) which was established in the Public Hall in 1913 or the Regal which opened just before the Second World War and was hit by incendiaries in October 1940 (ironically when showing the film "On the night of the fire")

At Haverhill cinema goers flocked to the Electric Empire in High Street, later renamed the Playhouse. Early cinemas had little of the latter day comforts; sometimes as at Soham they had rough walls, a corrugated iron roof, the floor was just earth, the seats wooden benches. The only heating was a small coke stove, the projector was operated by gaslight, the films often went astray and if they did arrive had to be operated by hand and would frequently break causing the audience to whistle, cat call and stamp their feet.

But despite it all people came to see cowboys and Indians, Harold Lloyd, the Keystone cops and the rest together with the serial such as the Adventures of Pearl White which each week left the heroine in another impossible situation from which she could surely not escape ...

The films in those early days were silent but the cinemas were not. First there was the musical accompaniment which varied from a single piano as at Soham to the eight piece orchestra at the Central Cinema Cambridge. Most agreed that their music was very pleasant though they deplored the all dominant American accents. Today those accents issue from innumerable television sets and cinemas are few and far between. Yet more and more films are being hired from video shops which have sprung up in villages around the county. Although there are plans for a new multi screen complex in Cambridge all that remains of The Victoria is memories and a 1931 facade held together with steel

1988 12 08

By 1932 Cambridge was reported as responding to a Government appeal to sell gold, jewellery and trinkets to help the national financial crisis.

"This is the time to spend — buy new clothes, furniture or extra food. Have your house decorated or painted. A prompt response to this appeal will lift thousands of homes from misery into happiness by Christmas."

The Cambridge Master Builders took out an advertisement to emphasise the problem: "Do you realise that 1,653 able-bodied men are totally unemployed in your own town. Do you realise that one of this appalling total 543 men are of the building trade." The corporation initiated new house-building schemes to give employment.

The suicide rate rose, despair continued and the international situation became graver. But during the war years the unemployment situation lessened due in part to "Butlins" — the "in" name for the government offices established at Brooklands Avenue which boosted central government employment by 35 per cent.

In 1959 the employment exchange was moved there from Newnham and reported that there were only 340 men and 67 women unemployed in the area, compared to 1,400 in July 1938.

"All-out drive to lure workers to pricey Cambridge" read the headlines in 1973 — sentiments repeated almost exactly today. "Shops have difficulty attracting staff, firms move away and leaflets are distributed in Lion Yard begging for workers. The windows of the job centre — now once more in Guildhall Street — are full of positions, but not for the Scotsmen on the benches in Lion Yard who still epitomise the degradation and misery bemoaned by their compatriot 87 years ago (Stories from a year — 1911).

"Why are there so many hard-working men on the scrapheap, living a life of degradation and misery?" These were the sentiments of an Aberdeen man, one of the first to use the newly-opened labour exchange in Guildhall Street in 1911. His quest for work had been unsuccessful.

Through the hardships of the 1920s and 1930s soup kitchens were opened to soften the pangs of hunger and the Town Council initiated a series of measures to find work for the unemployed. The sports facilities on Jesus Green and the paving stones along Queens Road are testimony to some of the job-creation schemes undertaken. Roads were constructed to serve the soon to be developed acres off Cherry Hinton Road and long-delayed schemes reassessed.

One of these was the revival of a project to relieve traffic congestion in Silver Street and make better communication with Newnham that had been long mooted — indeed the need for such a route had been voiced at the opening of Victoria Bridge in 1889. There was great opposition with nine separate schemes drawn up in 1923 and "if not for the urgency of the unemployment position we should be in the same position today, only instead of nine there would have been nineteen."

Such was the opinion of the Mayor in December, 1916 when the Fen Causeway was formally opened. It had given employment to 90 men during a two-year period.

By June 1933 some ten years work was coming to an end as the dredging of the River Cam was nearly complete. A steam dredger had been used in 1923 and one decade later so much soil had been removed that it could have covered Parker's Piece to a depth of nearly seven feet. The Conservators of the Cam were convinced that there would be no need for any more clearance for 30 years.

The maintenance of the River had always been a concern, many recalled the great flood of 1895 - the year that the scheme to divert sewage which flowed untreated from the colleges along the Backs away from the River to underground pipes leading to Cheddar's Lane pumping station had been initiated. Then in 1909 there had been more dredging - which was supposed to stop floods. But in 1914, 1916, 1918 and 1919 the old enemy, flooding, had returned - at precisely the time when resources had to be diverted to fighting the new enemy, Germany.

But the struggle to tame the river is much older than all this. One person who joined the fray was Charles Humfrey, in 1829. A banker by profession he turned his eyes to river banks instead, surveying the stretch of water from Mill Pool to Clayhithe which was the responsibility of the Cam Conservators, set up by Act of Parliament in 1702 to ensure that the barges on which Cambridge depended for its supplies should still be able to navigate, despite the activities of the Drainers - the interests of the one - who needed water to float the barges, conflicting with the other - who wanted to get rid of water as quickly as possible.

Despite their efforts there were complaints that the river was not deep enough for the 20 ton barges that were allowed to ply up to Cambridge. These vessels needed a depth of 2 ft 8 inches - Humfrey found the Cam to be at least 3 feet deep everywhere - and in some places there was nearly 10 feet of water. But the boatmen continued to claim that it took them as long to get from Kings Lynn to Clayhithe as it did from Clayhithe to the town.

Humfrey solved the mystery of the missing water. The River below Clayhithe was too shallow and the Conservators' water was being used to flush the barges over the shoals, emptying the Cam in the process. No wonder they then had to wait until the depth built up again. Various proposals were put forward - build a new sluice at Clayhithe, remove those at Baitsbite and Chesterton, do away with the old wooden construction in front of the Fort St George and put in a new lock further along Jesus Green. Then deepen the whole river to prevent the constant flooding along Midsummer Common which made the area an unhealthy swamp (especially with the sewage drifting down from the "Backs").

There was the additional problem of the stretch between Magdalene and Silver Street bridges. It could easily take half a day to make the journey, with the horses straining to pull against the tide and the bargees pushing with their "spread". And when they did get to Mill Pool they often found it so congested there was no room for them to enter and needed to moor alongside the college walls with their string of barges stretching down the Backs. Humfrey recommended that a series of posts be placed in the bed of the river and that the barges be winched up by pulleys mounted in the front of the lead boat. Journey time could be cut to an hour and academic calm restored. This idea, like most of his others, found few supporters.

The inmates of Colleges with apartments near the River continue to complain of the noise from the river but the working boats are now pleasure craft & Bargees' curses have changed to tourist laughter. The Cam which once brought commerce to the town now acts as a commercial for it._

Stories from a year 1934

January 29th 1934 started as just an ordinary day for Percy Titmous. By the time it was over he was world famous, In the words of the New York Herald Tribune he had become a "motorized knight", a Launcelot who'd rescued his Queen from dire distress.

Queen Mary was a regular visitor to Cambridge, in fact her honeymoon train had paused here briefly when en route to Sandringham in 1893. In 1918 she visited Papworth Hospital and the Cambridge military hospital in Burrell's Walk with King George V. Three years later they returned to inspect the National Institute of Agricultural Botany where crowds glimpsed a tall Imperial lady inside the smoothly running Royal car,

It was the car that betrayed what was to have been a secret visit in 1932 to the Fitzwilliam Museum. The Royal car had again been spotted in January 1934 parked outside the Cambridge Tapestry Works in Thompson's Lane and then in St Andrew's Street whilst her Majesty chose numerous tiny ivory objects for her famous Dolls House from Woolston's antiques shop.

Three weeks later she was due to return. The police were alerted that the Royal car had left and were keeping the route clear so that the Daimler should have an unimpeded run. In fact it was nothing of the sort. Three times the limousine broke down through overheating, finally coming to rest outside the Slap Up public house at Waterbeach.

It was here that Percy found them. His wife suggested he turn round to see if they needed assistance, but how do you approach a Queen. Percy paused some way off and waited for a sign. Soon the Lady in Waiting approached to explain the predicament and ask whether the Queen might hitch a lift to Cambridge in their little car.

The constables charged with keeping the road free from traffic tried several times to intercept the Titmous vehicle, only to jump aside when they recognised the passenger. Even Cambridge crowds normally used to anything were stunned they saw the Queen arrive in such a car. Queen Mary did her shopping, took tea at the Copper Kettle, and continued her journey to Exning and Sandringham in a replacement Royal limousine

Percy Titmous himself tried to slip away unobserved, but somebody had taken his car number and a call to the Council offices soon elicited his name. The news spread quickly and soon pressmen, news agencies and even film companies were hot on his trail.

The American newspapers were full of the story: "Queen Mary Thumbs Ride as Auto Quits" ran one headline which went on to describe how "townspeople stared in amazement from the sidewalks".

The Queen herself seemed unperturbed by the incident; her visits to Antiques shops continued unabated, as did her motoring adventures. In May 1939 her car was involved in an accident; on another occasion she got lost in the lanes around Six Mile Bottom causing her escort considerable anxiety and in August 1948 the Royal limo again broke down again at Lt Thetford Corner

History was not allowed to repeat itself however and this time she continued her journey in a police car.

Queen Mary was a great favourite with the people of Cambridge and her death in 1953 was keenly felt. Amongst those present at the funeral service in St George's chapel, Windsor, was Stanley Woolston, proprietor of the Antique shop she visited in a subject's car.

Stories from a year - 1935

Crossing the road could be difficult.

Ely was a case in point; in the early 1800s Fore Hill was, in bad weather, in a worse state than any fen drove. The ruts were so deep that most of the horse drawn vehicles couldn't get down them and large pieces of timber were placed across the street in various places so pedestrians could cross without being sucked into the mire.

Various views of Cambridge streets show somewhat similar situation but as the twentieth century arrived it was the amount of traffic that was the problem. A cartoon in the Cambridge Graphic of 1900 summarised the difficulties; seeing courteous drivers giving way to an elderly lady crossing on the arm of a kindly policeman one gentleman decides to try the same trick. Grabbing a likely escort he launches himself into the maelstrom only to find that it was the blue of the uniform, rather than the blue of the lady's eyes that had earned the passage.

Soon the horse traffic was being supplemented by the motor car with some drivers in 1904 making an effort to register their vehicles in Cambridge rather than London to take advantage of the more attractive number plates - the London registration was the letter "A" followed by four numbers, whereas here it was "CE" followed by just two figures. By then the number of licenced motor cars had rocketed from 27 in January up to 42 by April. By 1905 things were worse: it was doubtful whether any town of similar size had as many motors and motorcycles running about the streets as Cambridge in term time. Whereas once the problem had been the speeding cyclist now it was these mechanical monsters scorching by at 30-40 mph - although in 1909 a taxi driver was fined £2 for driving at the dangerous speed of 10-12 mph and by 1913 there was a speed limit of 15 mph in any inhabited part of the borough.

Various improvements were needed to make things safer. In 1916 the first traffic island was installed at the junction of Victoria Avenue and Chesterton Road. It was a wooden structure carried into the centre of the road every morning and removed each evening - much to the amusement of residents, though it was 1932 before the "Milton road merry-go-round" - Mitcham's corner roundabout was installed permanently.

The first one-way system started in Market Street and Petty Cury in 1925 and was followed two years later by the first traffic lights at the bottom of Castle Hill. They were supposed to release the policeman usually stationed there on point duty but - according to some sources - in fact meant that two police were needed - one to explain the system to befuddled motorists and the other to hold back the crowds of onlookers enchanted by the pretty changing lights.

By 1934 there were complaints that sometimes cars and bicycles were parked so closely in line in Petty Cury and Sidney Street that pedestrians could not find a space to cross over. Councillors debated long and hard, then decided to experiment with what one of them called "Orange Groves". By then the traffic congestion was so bad that the newspaper did not think they would be much use but the Belisha Beacons were installed in Market Street, Petty Cury, Emmanuel road and outside the Jolly Waterman at Mitcham's Corner in July 1935. The operation was conducted during the University vacation - what would the undergraduates make of them?

Within a week one of the orange globes - which it was claimed were tamper proof - was found lying in the roadway; the Beacon in Petty Cury suffered the same fate nights later. Those that did remain were "decorated" by student artists, though police vigilance removed the painted faces before many had chance to appreciate their handiwork. But the decision was made and despite their attraction - 34 stolen between January and April 1955 - the Beacons lit the way for pedestrians until the advent of "Zebra" crossings in 1952 and the modern "Pelican" in 1971._

Just across the river from Cambridge lay the little village of Chesterton, a prime site for development and the Inclosure Act of 1840 made the land available Edward Meadows, a brewer, saw his chance.

It was an area he knew well, being variously publican at the Fort St George, landlord of the Jolly Waterman and builder of the Portland Arms. Edward paid £1,200 for the old East Farthing Meadows in 1843 and by next year he had constructed a Road down to the river and started selling off building plots in Ferry Path. Elsewhere others were doing likewise and the new residents could stroll into town across the lush green commons separated from their homes only by the lush green stinking river Cam into which the town's sewage poured without check.

Several ferries plied across the river, the ferrymen making a useful living from the tolls they charged and the residents not being too inconvenienced by the delay in crossing. Sometimes people took themselves across, turning the handle that engaged the chain that ran across the bed of the river although when the ferry was on the other side it had to be pulled over by tugging on the chain itself, slimy - and worse - from the depths of the river.

Cambridge councillors meanwhile looked with dismay at the good folk of Chesterton who were using their facilities but not contributing to their rates. They tried to encourage them to become part of a greater Cambridge. One inducement proffered was a new road bridge to replace William Bates' ferry. In 1888 Chestertonians voted for the bridge, but then declined the amalgamation. Development continued apace.

Whilst the residents of Ferry Path were content to cross the river in the traditional way occupants of the new houses on the De Freville Estate were soon campaigning for something better - a footbridge. The tragic loss of life when a ferry sank at Fen Ditton in 1905 would have added fuel to their cause but no bridges were to be forthcoming whilst Chesterton was independent.

In 1913 the Borough council, having won its battle to absorb Chesterton, decided that a bridge was indeed necessary at Ferry Path, though it was another 14 years before it actually opened. William Pauley had operated the ferry since 1887 and carried an estimated one and a quarter million passengers. Those waiting to make a last nostalgic crossing were disappointed when the ferry sank just before the new bridge opened. Further downstream the Cutter ferry, worked for years by the Dant family, was also superseded by a footbridge, though it was brought back into use five years later when the bridge needed repairs.

Thus New Chesterton was up-to-date. But Old Chesterton still had to rely on the two ferries opposite the Green Dragon in Water Street. One was a heavily built craft that could carry horses and cattle across to Stourbridge Common, alongside it a light passenger ferry. When the river had been lowered in October 1920 to allow repairs at Baitsbite lock the two had been placed across the river with planks crossing the gap between them but this was only a temporary expedient.

Throughout 1935 they watched as foundations were put in, they listened to the thud of the pile driver in November but it was May 1936 before the bridge was actually open. The smaller ferry was repositioned near Banham's boatyard and was used by the engineers constructing the latest link between Chesterton and Cambridge - Elizabeth Bridge

The High spring tides coincide with heavy rain.

The great sluice at Denver cannot be opened to allow the rivers to empty into the sea and more and more water drains into the fenland river system.

The high river banks are full to the brim and are crumbling and dissolving in the water just as sugar dissolves in tea. Slips occur, the bank slides a bit, but as it threatens to break men rush to bolster it up with clay and sandbags.

The banks themselves are already two feet higher because of these lines of sacks but still the water seeps through and strong winds blow sheets of water out from the river and down into the adjoining fen fen that is itself a sea of mud comparable with the mud of Flanders. "The way feet sink in with a dull sucking noise reminds me of the time when we moved into Passchendale during the war".

The sodden fen means that lorries cannot get near to bring bags potato bags, sandbags any sort of bag and the sodden land itself is unsuitable for filling them. 10,000 bags have been laid since yesterday morning and the water is seeping through at the places they placed the bags yesterday afternoon

The men are willing but almost at the end of their tether. Most are now so tired that if some really terrible disaster came along they would hardly be any use at all.

Throughout the fen, along the top of river and drain every available man hundreds of men, wet and weary, watch the water in the river while even more rain penetrates their clothing and the incessant cold wind chills them even more.

There is talk of calling in the army and at Ely a bugler is standing by to sound a "fall in" for volunteers in the event of a major burst. The town criers at Haddenham and Swavesey are appealing for extra men to go to the aid of Willingham, just one of the danger points.

Barway and Lt Thetford have breached and the main A10 is cut by flooding near Stretham the car loads of undergraduates flocking to help must find another way on to the Isle of Ely.

The BBC broadcasts flood warnings urging people to alert their neighbours without wireless sets to listen for the church bells which will announce the time has come for evacuation. For many families it is already too later. Their land is under water, their homes are flooded.

"We fenland folk can stand a lot. The water has got to be coming over the doorstep before we begin to flit. A horseman tells me that the water has reached his front door... his wife is sweeping it away with a broom". It is the worst flood for many years worse than 1928, worse than last year. It is March 1937. "We've got out of scrapes before, and we'll get out of this one" says a fen farmer.

He is right. The floods of March 1937 are now largely forgotten. They were only a minor dampness compared to the devastation that was to follow ten years later.

Stories from a year - 1938

The plane was kept in the barn between a hay-tedder and a horse-rack, neglected for weeks at a time until the morning brought big white clouds and the spring air was soft. Then it was time to open the barn doors, to flush the brown hen from her clutch of eggs in the cockpit and brush away the hay dust, the straws dropped by the nest-building sparrows and the bird muck on the wings. Push the plane into the meadow, turn the propeller a time or two and then off and away.

It was David Garnett's dream since the afternoon in October 1929 when he had left his Hilton home for a stroll with his wife across the fields to Conington. The peace of the countryside was disturbed by the buzz of an engine as an aeroplane climbed, dived and landed in the farmer's field. They pushed through the hedge and strolled to the little shed where a group of young men were standing beside a light car and a couple of motorcycles. Did they give joy-rides - yes, come back in twenty minutes.

They walked around the small village, past the church and back to the field - what had they let themselves in for. Soon the plane was down again and one of them had to be first. David picked up his courage and climbed awkwardly into the cockpit, hitting his head as he did so. He gripped the side of the cockpit as the machine bumped across the grass, then suddenly they were above the hedges, above the trees and above the thin, narrow-gutted building that was his own house, looking down one of the chimneys as the pilot turned. But then came a dive and with it came panic. He was no longer interested in the view of the dove house or the fields of stubble brushed and combed with horse-rakes. His face was frozen, his hair felt as if it were being torn out by the roots - he would surely be bald by the time they landed - if they landed - when would they land. Then they were down and it was his wife's turn for her five-minute flip.

The engineer had no change when he paid for their ride - there was 9/- owing out of the pound note and he would have to come back. The second joy ride was followed by a first flying lesson when he actually took the controls, glimpsing the mysteries of stalling, gliding and banking. He landed slightly deaf but fifteen-years younger, very hungry and determined to fly.

By March 1930 the Cambridge Aero Club was losing money, the telephone was disconnected, the machines dispersed. It was inconvenient to undergraduates who had to drive nine miles through twisty by-roads for a twenty-minute lesson. And there was an alternative for in April 1929 an aerodrome had opened on Cambridge's Newmarket Road and in October they too had started giving flying lessons. Many famous aeronauts were to be found there, including Alan Cobham with his Flying Circus and in 1932 council officials were given an opportunity to see their town from the air, flying in a giant air liner.

Soon the airfield was too small and meetings were being held to discuss a new site near Teversham Corner; permission was granted and it opened in October of 1938. By then David Garnett was flying himself; he had followed his old instructor to Ipswich but had still failed to go solo. The journey depressed him as much as his lack of success so in October 1930 he had turned up at Marshalls and tried their Gipsy Moth aircraft. Once adapted by the addition of two cushions so that he could see out of the cockpit he made steady progress and on 22nd July 1931 he found himself in the air alone. He also got down and recorded his reminiscences in "A rabbit in the air" published in 1932, dreaming of his own plane in a barn but in the meantime borrowing one of Arthur Marshall's - as thousands have done since._

Perhaps it was somebody's idea of a joke; perhaps they hated capital punishment; perhaps they had consumed too much of the local brew. Whatever the reason there was no doubt. On Sunday night the gibbet was there, by Monday morning it had gone.

The monument in question stood beside the Old North Road at Caxton. It was of no great antiquity, having only been erected in April 1934, using timbers obtained from an old house at Baldock to replace a poor imitation. But it was part of the local folk-lore. It had even featured as a Christmas card - "with the season's greetings" - but who would want a reminder of such a grisly sight to decorate their festive mantelpiece.

It was here, locals remembered that they hung Kaiser Bill in August 1919 - though only in effigy - a fate that was to befall others in later times, including Arthur Scargill in

But as to who had actually been hanged there there is some doubt. One historian recorded the erection of gallows there in about 1346; others tell of seeing the body of a highwayman, the son of a Royston landlady, who had been convicted of robbing the mail coach in about 1753. After four or five months the screw which held the body was filed off and the next high wind brought the body to the ground. An inquisitive Fellow of Trinity College who was passing opened the corpse's clothes to see what a state the body was in and found it dry and not offensive.

There is a story too of a Yorkshireman who committed a murder in the neighbourhood, escaped to America, but returned some years later to the scene of his crime and talked too freely about his activities. He was hanged alive on the gallows to die through exposure or starvation; a passing baker took pity and gave him a loaf of bread. For this he too was hanged.

Then one Sunday night in April 1939 it was cut down, leaving just a stump about six inches high. Eight men carried the carcass with due solemnity into the Hotel yard. The men from the brewery came out post haste and decided that the gibbet should not be allowed to die. Soon a replacement was once more standing near the cross-roads, an attraction to tourists and a deterrent to highwaymen - none of which have been seen near the site since._

Wartime was no time for preservation. With the threat of bombing, the need to save for warships and the uncertainty of the future who could worry about the past.

Thus the announcement at Easter 1940 that the Cambridgeshire Cottage Preservation Society had finished restoring the group of buildings known as Wright's Row in Grantchester - and had done so without recourse to the public purse - was remarkable. Even more so was the report that two additional cottages adjoining the Row and known as Crossways had been given to the Society and were themselves being reconditioned.

The Society had been formed two years earlier by a small group of people who were saddened to see the derelict cottages scattered everywhere throughout the County. They were part of the rural heritage and, in their decay, picturesque.

They had earlier attracted the attention of another group of people - the Cambridge Antiquarian Society - who had decided in 1904 to build up a pictorial record of the contemporary scene before it was changed forever by "natural decay, accident or wilful destruction". The Cambridgeshire Photographic Survey was revived post-war when various members journeyed to the surrounding villages, collected postcards and took photographs of domestic architecture, barns and farmyards which have now often disappeared. Sometimes the original photographer was less than certain of the name of the street in which he stood to take his picture and today even dedicated village historians have difficulty today identifying all the scenes they recorded.

Their pictures are now in daily use in the Cambridgeshire Collection where people planning to re-restore their cottages take the opportunity of seeing just what it did look like before post-war, and less sympathetic alteration. But whereas the work of the Antiquarian Society members picture the past, the work of the Cottage Preservation Society has allowed it to survive.

In 1940 they were also owners of two cottages at Kingston, for which they paid £80, and three at Orwell, bought for £120. Generally, as at Grantchester, the buildings, although inhabited, had no amenities whatsoever and were in a bad state of repair. The Society turned its attention to its first purchase, a group of cottages at Toft, most of which were covered by a demolition order. But before it could act some were requisitioned for the use of evacuees. A Yorkshire woman, fleeing from Sheffield with her old parents and her children arrived in Toft and worried the authorities into letting her have the oldest of the condemned cottages, promising to make it habitable herself. Neighbours had been emptying their earth closets there along with all manner of rubbish; rats had made it their home and flies infested the cottages. She cleared and cleaned and killed and buried, then moved in.

In 1944 the Society acquired cottages at Landbeach, ten years later 29 cottages in the High Street at Gt Abington were put up for sale and 15 bought for the Society. Next year they bought five cottages in Willingham - for the grand price of £200. The rents then were £18 per year.

Some tenants were not too regular with the rent. At one of their properties at Fen Drayton the occupier claimed nobody had called for the rent for three years and he had not known where to send it. When members of the committee arrived he slowly ascended the creaking stairs and descended with a bag containing the cash. Three years rent came to £30.

When Helen Larke wrote the history of the Cottage Improvement Society in 1970 she stated that they were always on the look out for suitable cottages for sale at a reasonable price. Twenty years later many individuals are also searching for the cottage with roses around the door - and are horrified to see just what a state their dream home was in when the Antiquarian men saw photographed it 60 years ago. The Cottage Improvement Society continue their work, acquiring properties to let to village folk.

The case before the court was, said the Mayor, "the worst we have ever had". During 1941 many of the offences that had been brought for trial had related to wartime activities - soldiers driving the wrong way down one-way streets, a bigamous marriage to a gunner air sergeant, a waitress undercharging evacuees - "she felt sorry for them" - or theft of Hurricane or Spitfire collecting boxes. This was no exception. It was indeed a shocking offence in a year that had seen Cambridge bombed on several occasions.

They had started on the bitter night of January 16th with something like 200 incendiaries in the vicinity of Hyde Park corner; the Perse school had been hit along with a warehouse in Regent Street. Next morning the sight of the blackened buildings contrasted vividly with a May tree transformed to a solid mass of icicles by the water from the firemen's hoses. Two weeks later the houses beside Mill Road Bridge had been hit and two died.

February saw a bomb in Cherry Hinton road demolish the porch of a house, but on the 24th the raiders returned to the area with Incendiaries followed by High Explosives in Grantchester Meadows and a mixture of both between Hyde Park Corner and Station Road. The three-phase attack killed eleven, including wardens and firewatchers.

A more determined attack with fire bombs came on 9th May when hundreds were showered in the area between Hills Road and Trumpington Road. Fifty houses received direct hits yet all but four were put out within a few minutes with stirrup pumps and sand, testimony to the efficiency of the wardens and Auxiliary Fire Service. Romsey Town was the next area to suffer with ten high explosives; two houses in Great Eastern Street were hit, causing two more deaths and injuries to seven people.

Newspapers were prevented by the censor from identifying the area raided - it was just "an East Anglian town". They were banned too from commenting on the weather conditions but it was felt that the heavy rain, which kept people indoors, was responsible for the complete absence of casualties when a stick of high explosives and incendiaries fell in Huntingdon Road just beside Shire Hall on September 29th. Extensive damage was caused to telephone wires but there was no traffic in the road at the time or they could not have escaped.

Following each raid came the repairs - replacing damaged tiles and cracked glass, with the WVS on the scene to supply refreshment and neighbours rallying around to hear of narrow escapes - how the children had slept through it all, though bombs fell only feet away.

But not all the damage was caused by enemy action. In February three old ladies were killed instantly when a returning RAF bomber crashed on to houses in Histon Road. Damage to morale was coming from Lord Haw Haw broadcasting from Germany whose claims that every house in every village and hamlet in the Isle of Ely were to be smashed as a punishment for receiving evacuated Jews were mentioned as one factor in another court case.

The Mayor's wrath however was aimed at a Glisson Road resident who had allowed a light to show from an upstairs window whilst a raid was actually taking place. The offender, himself a warden, had gone to his post when the bombs started falling, unaware of the defective blackout. After deliberation the Mayor decided not to impose a prison sentence but fined him £5 - the equivalent of two weeks wages for a farm worker.

Stories from a year – 1942, by Mike Petty

The news of the fall of the impregnable naval base and fortress at Singapore broke in the Cambridge area a few days after its capitulation. Official spokesmen revealed that amongst the forces that had put up a magnificent fight against the invading Japanese were members of the Cambridgeshire Regiment. It was known that the Governor, Sir Shenton Thomas, son of a former vicar of St Barnabas church, had been interned.

It was not known what had happened to the local soldiers. "It may be some time before details of a personal nature are received ... it is, regrettable and trying as it may be, just a matter of waiting with as much patience as possible."

First news arrived in March. It was heartbreakingly brief - a mere statement that four named officers were posted as "missing"; "it is hoped that he is safe although he may be a prisoner of war". Next week came more names to add to the missing list - and more photographs in the local paper. There was however more positive news for one family - a cable from Lieut Harradine to say that he had reached safety after an adventurous journey of 24 days - but no indication of where the cable had originated. By 27th March the Cambridge Independent Press was having to devote two pages to photographs of familiar faces whose status was unknown. By the 9th of April there were so many to record that the paper did not have space for them all and restricted itself to the village men - Bolton and Davies, Rouse and Brown, Brand and Brown ... The town lads were however being featured in the Cambridge Daily News as space permitted.

There was still no news by May when relatives met at the Guildhall to hear the Founder of the British Prisoners of War Books and Games Fund. So far one-third of a million books had been sent out and libraries equipped in every Prisoner of War camp in Germany, Italy, Occupied France and North Africa. But for most in her audience all that was too near - their thoughts were further East.

Meanwhile life went on. During the hardship of the time farmers tried to hide petrol in pigsties, conscientious objectors tried to dodge the conditions of their registration. There were threats of a water shortage - to save coal at the pumping station and Herbert Morrison - Minister of Home Security - called for a "clean and decisive victory" when addressing a meeting of students at that same Guildhall. There were worries of invasion, rumours of air raids, and tales of daring from returning heroes.

Then in Mid May came a letter from Singapore. It said there were only light casualties - but had been written before the capitulation from a ship somewhere between Singapore and Sumatra. A Malayan civil servant supplied news of Sir Shenton, being with him at Government House during the Japanese bombardment. He was concerned about the health of his wife who developed dysentery on the very day the enemy landed. Nevertheless he was awaiting his future with great courage and dignity.

Weeks passed with only negative news until a Bourn lady received a letter from a business friend with Far East connections. "All prisoners of war and internees in Singapore are being well treated, have their freedom on the island and are being well fed, and can play games". Bombs hit the Union society and shattered houses and lives, German-born students were interned as aliens, the King toured Burwell fen - and then in October came news. 1100 postcards had arrived by ship in Lourenzo Marques addressed to relatives of men who had been in Singapore, the War office were trying to contact the families involved. Later Lord Haw Haw had news on his German radio broadcast - how could he know what we did not - or was it just his usual propaganda.

In December came the first official lists of Prisoners of War in Japanese hands - just name, rank and number - but seen as heartening news for some local families at the end of a year of waiting. At the same time news was breaking about the treatment of Jews in German extermination camps - thank goodness our men were elsewhere ..._

Village life did not stop just because there was a war on. The whist drives and dances, Women's Institutes and Parish councils continued as ever. But there were changes.

Conington church had been tastefully decorated for Christmas 1942 - sadly they could not ring the church bells before Holy Communion; nor could Swavesey sound the traditional peal between 5 and 6 on Christmas Morning - indeed the service had to transfer to the Vicarage because of the lighting restrictions - but they did ring out at midday. If anybody thought that this meant invasion was imminent then it was too bad.

At that time of Good Will it was appropriate that Elsworth's carol-singing total of £10 should go to the Prisoner of War fund, Swavesey dance to the "Crazy Crochets" raise money for the "Comforts Fund" and Lolworth's waste paper and rags salvage should go mainly to the Red Cross - although 10/- was invested in savings stamps for the boys who had collected it.

As 1943 proceeded there was news of local lads - home on leave - Rev W.H. Hills of Fen Drayton who celebrated Communion whilst back in the parish, meeting in the desert, winning medals - a DFM for pilot-officer Wilkerson of Swavesey - or dying for their country - sergeant-pilot Kendrick of Elsworth whose funeral in April was attended by his fellow officers.

The uncertainty after the fall of Singapore was slowly being resolved - a telegram from Tokyo told a mother that amongst those interned in Changi camp was her daughter. Shortly afterwards a son wrote "Dear mother and dad. I am safe and well ... please remember me to all at home". The following week's lecture to Elsworth Women's Institute became especially interesting for it was entitled "Japan before the war"

Wings for Victory week saw parishes raising morale as well as money. Swavesey was set a target of £4,000. They organised a parade headed by the Home Guard which ended on the Recreation Group with a display of their weapons, a dance including the sale of lemons given by a Commando lately returned from Tunisia; the whist drive was disappointing, the fancy dress parade and games better, a pin could be stuck in Hitler - people queuing to be blindfolded and to try to find the most painful place - and the final total came to £6,645. Some of it would go to supply additional large rubber dinghies suitable for a four-engined bomber like the one they'd bought earlier in the year

But there were particular problems during war. Swavesey had to decide where to station the National Fire Service engine - the answer on the site of the old engine house and the adjoining parish pound - but was it worth cleaning out the pond to provide a source of water should the engine be needed. Certainly the Home Guard were doing a great job but they were also cluttering up the village with the materials they'd wanted as obstructions but never actually used

All this and the weddings, the house sales - a thatched cottage for £620, the pig club meetings and retiring organists, were grist to the mill for Cyril Vincent. Forced by ill health to give up his work in London and settle in Swavesey he became the local reporter for the Cambridge Independent Press in 1896. His paragraphs on Lolworth, Conington and the rest were carefully filed and it was his proud boast that he could turn up any item at will. They are now housed in the Cambridgeshire Collection.

Perhaps his biggest headline came in December 1943. It was the story of the death of one of the newspapers' most valued contributors, a man who had reported village life for nearly 50 years - C.R. Vincent himself._

By the 2nd of June 1944 the military preparations for the invasion of Europe were ready to roll. The troops were massed along the South coast waiting for the right conditions for the attack. Despite all the careful planning however surprise was essential. The Germans must be given no hint of what was about to happen

On the 2nd of June 1944 in Cambridge another military exercise was being put into operation. Whereas throughout the war the presence of American servicemen had been hushed up now it was being trumpeted. Though now it was the dead who were attracting the publicity with the dedication of the American Military Cemetery at Madingley.

Many of those commemorated had been lost whilst delivering bombs to Germany - always a hazardous undertaking - as four railwaymen were about to prove on that same day, 2nd June 1944.

It was at fifteen minutes past midnight that Driver Benjamin Gimbert and Fireman James Nightall set off from March marshalling yards with a consignment of fifty-one wagons full of bombs and detonators. Their journey proceeded without incident through Ely and Barway and on towards Soham at a steady 20 mph.

That night the signalman on duty at Soham box was "Sailor" Frank Bridges. He heard the engine whistle and noticed it stop briefly just outside the station. As he looked along the track he could see that what should have been a blacked-out train was in fact a very bright one. He came down on to the platform to offer assistance.

The whistle had been to alert Guard Clarke of an unscheduled stop. He saw the flames 51 ammunition wagons in front of him but walked towards the fire. He walked the length of three wagons forwards, within seconds he found himself thrown the length of six wagons back.

Gimbert had noticed the leading wagon with its forty 500-lb bombs was ablaze and knew that something had to be done. The easiest thing would have been to stop and run but that was not his way. Instead he stopped and Fireman Nightall ran - back to the blazing bomb load. He disconnected that one wagon from the other fifty and rejoined his driver on the footplate. Together they steamed through the station pulling the burning load clear.

Soham citizens slept soundly until their windows shattered and their beds shook as five tons of high explosives detonated and a crater fifteen feet deep and sixty-six feet wide appeared where once their station had stood. Those first on the scene found the twisted machinery, the shattered signal box and the wrecked bodies of Fireman Nightall and Signaller Bridges. They also found the heroic Driver Gimbert and fifty other fully-loaded ammunition wagons amazingly still intact.

American troops were quickly on the scene, the craters were filled and the line reopened to munitions trains. But German newspapers reported the explosions demonstrating their knowledge of every little incident. Meanwhile Somewhere Else in England many other heroes were waiting for the right conditions - A-day, B-day, C-day ... D-Day_

The cablegram read "Philip fit and well, Bangkok. Reply c/o Swiss Consulate". It had been handed in at Bangkok on August 27th 1945 and meant that Captain W.P.O. Unwin of Histon, a member of the Cambridgeshire Regiment who, like so many others, had been captured at the fall of Singapore in February 1942 was now free and would soon be making the long sea voyage home. Soon came other news 35,000 prisoners had been released on Singapore Island alone, others were in camps inland, still more in Saigon ... For some it was tremendous news in what had been a long, hard year

By 1945 people had become heartily sick of the war and weary of shortages of every kind toilet rolls were virtually unobtainable, you took one with you when you went visiting. Rationing was more severe than ever. On the War Front the success of D Day in the previous June had been followed by the liberation of Paris and the long slog across country; in January HMS Walpole, the destroyer 'adopted' by the people of Ely, was sunk off the Dutch coast with the loss of two of her crew & the British Army crossed the Rhine, Mussolini was killed by Italian partisans and the German army in Italy surrendered; the Russians reached Berlin. Hitler committed suicide on April 30th and Germany capitulated on May 7th

Widespread celebrations greeted VE Day; on May 8th several thousand students assembled in Cambridge Market Square, singing, dancing and cheering; a waste paper dump in St Mary's Passage became a bonfire. Next day there was dancing in the streets, the official proclamations, long queues for tea shops and restaurants & a torchlight procession to Midsummer Common where there was another bonfire. An effigy of Hitler was burnt at Littleport, Sutton church was floodlit, Union Jacks and streamers decorated the Stretham streets.

The statue of Oliver Cromwell at St Ives was decorated with a dustbin lid; at Ramsey a chair was fixed to the church steeple, at Hartford children roasted potatoes in the hot ashes of a bonfire, and a WAAF climbed the war memorial at Huntingdon to put a cigarette in the statue's lips. At St Neots the town echoed to the sound of hammering as men festooned the streets with flags, and two American Military Policemen with white helmets and white spats patrolled the town before the carnival got under way

But amongst all the happy headlines were the usual sad stories a Needingworth family had learned of the death of their son and news came in from Belsen Concentration Camp where a St Ives man was helping tend the victims "They are packed in huts like sardines, and they do everything in the huts because they are too weak to move; some we found sleeping on top of dead bodies the stench is terrible ... the camp stretches over acres and acres, it has been the training place for the SS troops so you can tell how the patients have been treated ..." little comfort for those whose sons were in camps in the Far East.

Evacuee children, some of whom had been with their foster families since the start of the war, were taken to local stations, where foster parents bade them a sad and tearful farewell before returning to homes that were now empty and quiet. The last Parades for the Special Police, Civil Defence and Fire Guard Services were held on Parker's Piece in June, and the 8th US Army Air Force was awarded the Honorary Freedom of Cambridge in July.

But still the Japanese were battling on and the members of the Cambridgeshire Regiment were enduring heaven knows what. August 6th saw an Atom bomb dropped on Hiroshima, three days later another destroyed Nagasaki. On August 11th Japan surrendered; three weeks later came the telegram to the Histon home

As the Prisoners from the Far East returned so civic receptions were held to welcome them home. The local politicians talked about homes for heroes, somebody noticed activity that might mean the glass was about to be restored to the windows at Kings College chapel. The Post Office experienced a bumper rush at Christmas but throughout the county hundreds waited for a letter just a card carrying happy news from foreign parts that never came

Peace was still coming - the men of the Cambridgeshire Regiment were back from the Far East and in February they gathered at Ely cathedral for a stirring service of thanksgiving and memorial - they had chosen that particular Sunday - it was just 4 years ago that their relations in England had learned the tragic news of their men's capture in Singapore. In March their drums followed them - the drums which carried their Regimental battle honours but been lost in the fall of Singapore had been discovered by a Dullingham woman working for the Red Cross whilst picnicking - they arrived at Cambridge station and were displayed in Joshua Taylor's windows

Padre J.N. Duckworth told a meeting of the Cambridge Royart Club of the grim conditions the Cambridgeshire men had experienced as prisoners of the Japanese ... of the inspiring spirit and morale under the most terrible conditions. In August 1944 he had been in the "valley of the shadow of death", 450 miles long through which they were constructing the Burma-Thailand railway, his audience were horrified to hear of the conditions and of the state of the men suffering ulcers, malaria, beri beri and dysentery. It had been August 13th 1945 when his particular camp had heard on their small Japanese radio of the atom bomb dropped on Hiroshima, four days later it was over - "there was no flag waving or anything like that, just a long sigh of relief".

There were housing problems: squatters taking over army Nissen Huts in Hills Road and the Hundred Houses society announced plans for a development of 200 houses to be called the Scotland Farm Estate in Chesterton but South Cambridgeshire Rural district council were boycotting prefabs - they had been waiting 12-18 months for them, had not got any and did not look like getting any - anyway they were getting more expensive - prices had gone up from £600 to £1200. But they were worth the wait according to housewives "It was just marvellous in prefabland - the kind of home I always wanted

RATIONING WAS REINTRODUCED and the Ministry of food introduced a new recipe for Squirrel pie. There were swoops on black marketeers but problems over eggs in Comberton - with a court case involving a 42 year old wife throwing 80 eggs at her 70 year old husband

But there were problems on local farms: county agricultural wages board proposed to increase rate for women workers to 50/- for a 48 hour week - but they could not agree to the claim for a 90/- minimum wage for men

President of the National Union of Agricultural Workers told a Cottenham Labour Party fete what should be done - "there are Italian and German prisoners working on our farms - it is time they were returned to their own countries to work the land there - British farms should have British labour

Polish immigrants were in the news: 6,000 Poles of General Anders army were due in this country shortly with another 12,000 every other week until the army of 100,000 had been absorbed - Cambridge Trades Council were not in favour - though they were told by Major Symonds that they should not forget what the Poles had done for us during the war - 9 out of 10 had fought on our side, a large number were pilots in the Battle of Britain

Not all the foreigners were unwelcome: A Steeple Morden man charged as co-respondent an Italian prisoner of war of adultery - he'd been based at their bungalow between July 1943 and July 1944 and in that November his wife had presented him with a child that looked more like the lodger than the husband

DIVORCE rates soared ... a Cambridge man claimed he was "unlucky in the women he'd married" - a bad run of luck - he'd divorced his first wife, remarried and then made two bigamous marriages just to compound the felony.

The first of some 10,000 GI BRIDES left for America – and Lady Bragg took to the air in January as the first passenger on the reopening of Marshall's civil flying school after the war- it would be building up a fleet of aircraft for air charter and air taxi work

Aneurin Bevan announced plans for a NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE but Addenbrooke's Hospital managers saw it as a threat - it would destroy the local interest, enterprise and pride in the hospital service and set up a soulless state monopoly

Other plans were also being laid and in Cambridge in October the town came to a standstill. The Market Hill was full, windows and roofs packed with spectators as the sound of the drums heralded the arrival of a parade which had left from Parker's Piece and marched proudly along Regent Street and Petty Cury - a route lined with townspeople who watched the passing columns in a quiet, dignified way - no cheering, no applause, just respectful silence.

The Honorary Freedom of the Borough was bestowed on the Cambridgeshire Regiment in recognition of its service in the South African War, for its superb professionalism during the fighting in Flanders and for its valiant fight in the Far East.

That fight had not ended with the last shots fired in the defence of Singapore - in fact the courage that was now being recognised was the years of captivity that followed. In prison camps scattered all over the Far East they had suffered every hardship, lack of food, disease, cruelty, indignities and utter isolation. Among many ordeals the building of the railway in the grim jungles of Siam was singled out by the Mayor for especial mention.

Now there was flag waving - and a particular flag had place of honour from the Guildhall flagpole - the blue flag of the 1st Battalion of the Cambridgeshire Regiment that had somehow been kept hidden from their captives during the long years of captivity.

As the procession wended its way down Petty Cury it was the drums that marked their progress. And amongst the drums were some emblazoned with the Regiment's honours won in earlier wars but lost in the fall of Singapore. Amazingly they had been found by a Dullingham girl, Mary Taylor during her work with the Red Cross and shipped back to Cambridge.

In October 1946 they led the old men of the First War and prematurely old boys from the Second to the Guildhall to receive the Freedom they had fought to preserve.

Stories from a year – 1946, by Mike Petty

As 1946 drew to its close the newspaper headlines reflected the principal issues : "A NEW TOWN FOR CAMBRIDGESHIRE" - it would be welcomed said Cambridge councillors; "BOUNDARY QUESTION AND CLAIMS OF SUFFOLK" - Suffolk seek to take over the villages of Chippenham and Snailwell in response to Cambridgeshire's claim to take in Newmarket; "FLOOD PROTECTION SCHEME" - details of finance still had to be finalised; "RAILWAY STATION SCHEME" - proposed for Cambridge as part of large improvement programme, including electrification. But this was 1946 and the details below the headlines were different from those currently occupying local politicians.

Other plans were also being laid and in Cambridge in October the town came to a standstill. The Market Hill was full, windows and roofs packed with spectators as the sound of the drums heralded the arrival of a parade which had left from Parkers Piece and marched proudly along Regent Street and Petty Cury - a route lined with townspeople who watched the passing columns in a quiet, dignified way - no cheering, no applause, just respectful silence.

The Honorary Freedom of the Borough was to be bestowed on the Cambridgeshire Regiment in recognition of its service in the South African War, for its superb professionalism during the fighting in Flanders and for its valiant fight in the Far East.

That fight had not ended with the last shots fired in the defence of Singapore - in fact the courage that was now being recognised was the 3½ years of captivity that followed. In prison camps scattered all over the Far East they had suffered every hardship, lack of food, disease, cruelty, indignities and utter isolation. Among many ordeals the building of the railway in the grim jungles of Siam was singled out by the Mayor for especial mention.

The full extent of their sufferings was being to be revealed. Padre J.N. Duckworth had told members of Cambridge Rotary of the inspiring spirit and morale under the most terrible conditions. In August 1944 he had been in the "valley of the shadow of death", 450 miles long through which they were constructing the Burma-Thailand railway, his audience were horrified to hear of the conditions and of the state of the men suffering ulcers, malaria, beri beri and dysentery. In October 1946 they led the old men of the First War and prematurely old boys from the Second to the Guildhall to receive the Freedom they had fought to preserve.

Forty three years later plans for new towns, railways and boundaries are set aside whilst Mayors once more pay homage to lads who never aged and old men who can never forget._

Stories of flood 1937 & 1947 by Mike Petty 13.3.1997

The High spring tides coincide with heavy rain.

The great sluice at Denver cannot be opened to allow the rivers to empty into the sea and more and more water drains into the fenland river system. The high river banks are full to the brim and are crumbling and dissolving in the water just as sugar dissolves in tea. Slips occur, the bank slides a bit, but as it threatens to break men rush to bolster it up with clay and sandbags.

The banks themselves are already two feet higher because of these lines of sacks but still the water seeps through and strong winds blow sheets of water out from the river and down into the adjoining fen fen that is itself a sea of mud comparable with the mud of Flanders. "The way feet sink in with a dull sucking noise reminds me of the time when we moved into Passchendale during the war".

The sodden fen means that lorries cannot get near to bring bags potato bags, sandbags any sort of bag and the sodden land itself is unsuitable for filling them. 10,000 bags have been laid since yesterday morning and the water is seeping through at the places they placed the bags yesterday afternoon

The men are willing but almost at the end of their tether. Most are now so tired that if some really terrible disaster came along they would hardly be any use at all. Throughout the fen, along the top of river and drain every available man hundreds of men, wet and weary, watch the water in the river while even more rain penetrates their clothing and the incessant cold wind chills them even more.

There is talk of calling in the army and at Ely a bugler is standing by to sound a "fall in" for volunteers in the event of a major burst. The town criers at Haddenham and Swavesey are appealing for extra men to go to the aid of Willingham, just one of the danger points. Barway and Lt Thetford have breached and the main A10 is cut by flooding near Stretham the car loads of undergraduates flocking to help must find another way on to the Isle of Ely.

The BBC broadcasts flood warnings urging people to alert their neighbours without wireless sets to listen for the church bells which will announce the time has come for evacuation.

For many families it is already too later. Their land is under water, their homes are flooded. "We fenland folk can stand a lot. The water has got to be coming over the doorstep before we begin to flit. A horseman tells me that the water has reached his front door... his wife is sweeping it away with a broom".

It is the worst flood for many years worse than 1928, worse than last year. It is March 1937. "We've got out of scrapes before, and we'll get out of this one" says a fen farmer. He is right. The floods of March 1937 are now largely forgotten. They were only a minor dampness compared to the devastation that was to follow ten years later.

1947: The High spring tides coincide with a sudden thaw of the heavy snow. The great sluice at Denver cannot be opened to allow the rivers to empty into the sea and more and more water drains into the fenland river system.

The high river banks are full to the brim and are crumbling and dissolving in the water just as sugar dissolves in tea. Slips occur, the bank slides a bit, but as it threatens to break men rush to bolster it up with clay and sandbags ... it's the same old story, March 1937 over again but this time worse.

On March 16th 1947 hurricane force winds swept sheets of water over the bank tops and sent the patrolling men scurrying for shelter. Roads were blocked by fallen trees, telephone lines blown down and 190 people evacuated from the Prickwillow area as flooding threatened. But it was March 17th when the main breaches occurred. One was at Lt Thetford which swamped the main railway line and spread south to close the Wicken road and threaten the main A10 at Stretham Ferry. The other was way out in the fen near Earith where a 50 yard gap had been torn in the river bank and properties at Over and Willingham were flooded, the water flowing east until it was checked by the main Old West river bank alongside which runs the Earith to Willingham road

For a while this held back the flood but as the water level increased so the very bank itself was overtopped and water began to trickle into Hill Row fen. A wholesale evacuation started, first the tools of their trade farm implements and livestock, then furniture and effects. Behind them came a steady stream of water driving rabbits and rats ahead of it. By nightfall on the 18th much of what in the morning had been fertile fen was a mass of grey water. Houses, farm buildings and stacks stood deserted and marooned whilst families found shelter where they could. Elsewhere the battle continued.

For five days water poured unchecked through the broken bank and rose higher and higher, brick by brick, up the flooded houses. Then on the 24th "Operation Neptune" finally sealed the breach by constructing a steel wall of amphibious vehicles around it and allowing more orthodox repair work to start. Hundreds of pumps were brought in to suck the water off the land and throw it back into the rivers.

As the floods went down and families returned to their shattered homes they were horrified by the sights that confronted them. Ruined shells of houses, stinking mud impregnated walls, scratches on the windowsills where rats had scabbled to keep above the water. Undeterred they replanted their fields, rebuilt their houses and eventually when the walls had finally dried out made them homes again.

Since then new rivers have been cut, the banks have been strengthened but should nature once more combine wind, waves and water then danger will once more threaten. The fenman can never be complacent, the threat is never ending

In Soham in 1948 the talk was of the two mills, one was now rising from the ashes and would be good for the village whilst the other was good for nothing.

It had been in July 1945 that fire had gutted the fine, modern roller mill owned by Messrs Clark and Butcher. One of the oldest and best-known firms in East Anglia, they specialised in making biscuit flour and indeed had won medals for their product. Its destruction was a serious setback but now, three years later the firm was back in production and corn was once more arriving by road and rail.

By contrast no corn arrived at the other mill in Soham mere. It had been built by Hunts, the Soham millwrights, in 1867 at a cost of £1,000, for two brothers. One was tall and stout and of uncertain temper, while the other was short and thin and very good natured. The tall brother died aged 75 but when the short brother was ninety Mr Clark, who owned the roller mills, met him in the street. "Well, John," he said, "if you live to be one hundred I'll give you half a crown a week". The old man lived to be 107!

His mill was one of the thousands used for draining the fens. As the wind blew and the sails turned so the power was converted to drive a large wooden wheel that would reach down into the fenland dykes and scoop the water up and over the high river banks into the river.

When the fens were drained and the water extracted from the peat soil so the level of the land shrank, leaving the bed of the river higher than the adjacent fields. High banks had now to be constructed to keep the water in and some method found to lift the water from the ditches and throw it up into the river. Hence the need for these wind engines which grew up throughout the area.

Yet as the land dried more so it shrank further. One windmill could no longer lift the water high enough. So a second was built alongside the first to raise the water part way - and sometimes another beside that. Yet they were all dependent on the wind. If there was no breeze to turn the sails then the mill would not pump; if the breeze turned into a gale then it might turn the sails too quickly, causing friction that could set it on fire, or even blow the mill off its base and send it walking across the fen.

New technology came to the drainers' aid with the advent of the great steam pumps that could work whenever needed and could move far more water than the old-fashioned windmill. In turn steam was phased out by diesel and so by 1948, just a year after the great floods, the ramshackled old mill was no further use to anybody.

The County Council had been busily negotiating the transfer of their drainage powers throughout 1948 and by May had come to the decision that the only answer lay in demolition. Enthusiasts protested at the loss of this rare survival of a drainage mill but to no avail - it was just too dangerous.

So the demolition men moved in to pull it over with a tractor. They failed. Undaunted they returned with gunpowder. They failed. So in the end eight charges of gelignite had to be used to topple the "dangerous" structure. Ironically just eight years later another Hunt's mill, much younger, much less impressive and in a much worse state, was re-built and erected just next door, at Wicken Fen, where it is lauded as the last of the fenland wind drainage mills._

In January 1949 motorists at Trumpington experienced a warm glow, the shadows that had been blighting their lives disappeared at least in part when sodium lighting was introduced as an experiment on the stretch of road between Brooklands Avenue and Bentley Road.

Twelve 140 watt bulbs dramatically improved their night time visibility providing six times more light than the old fittings and at cheaper cost. By 1952 the Council had decided to install 400 of the new lights in a crash programme and the following year Cambridge could boast that it was one of the first cities in the country to be lit entirely by sodium.

Sometimes brighter lights caused dangers in 1911 complaints had been aired that the new gas lights on Barnwell Bridge were too powerful and were dazzling motorists. Generally however they were appreciated.

New lights were welcomed in one village: "The traffic through Sawston has increased considerably of late years" commented the Cambridge Chronicle. "The one continuous street, in the bends and narrow parts, where the inhabitants are their thickest, has been dangerous to drive through during the dark evenings of winter" a common statement, except that it was written in November 1882 106 years ago.

It was 1836 when the streets of Ely were lighted with coal gas for the first time; the lamps were "well made and placed upon elegant painted cast iron pillars" and the inhabitants well pleased with the result. Swavesey had followed suit in February 1886 with Willingham limping behind in 1891, whilst at Fulbourn in January 1893 a public supper was held at the Six Bells Inn to celebrate the completion of the lighting of their village by oil lamps following a successful experiment the previous year. The parish debates all took much time.

In 1893 Cherry Hinton were anxiously scanning the various Acts of Parliament to see which one was best suited to their circumstances. Such had been the recent expansion that unless they were careful the old part of the village would end up paying for the lighting of the newly developed Rock and Cavendish estates. They were also debating the type of light oil or gas or perhaps they should form their own company to generate electricity, at a cost of about £4,000.

It was a familiar debate for Cambridge where in 1757 people were quite convinced that better lighting would increase fights between groups who now groped their way past each other unrecognised in the dark. However an Act of Parliament of 1788 empowered the better lighting of the town, new lamps were installed and lit for the first time on a September evening that year. Oil lamps gave way to gas and in 1840 a contract was signed with the Cambridge Gas Light Company for the installation of 350 lamps. The first lamp post was installed outside the Newmarket Road works and others followed throughout the central area.

The lamp posts themselves were often the subject of motor accidents or high spirits, with inebriated undergraduates often shinning up them to light their cigarettes from the gas flame. During rag time it became the norm to put out the light the answer to this was to wrap the posts in greasy rags to prevent people climbing them though it was soon realised that such greasy rags could easily be set alight a much better sport! During both World Wars the lights were extinguished and a reflective strip painted on the posts to prevent people walking into them in the black out. However it was on VJ night in 1945 that the most prominent street light became a casualty of the celebrations. The large light on Parker's Piece had been erected in 1894 at a cost of £39 and when repaired and redesigned in 1946 became the first fluorescent light in the country. It was repainted in 1973 and now adds a touch of brightness to the Cambridge scene by both day and night.

Cambridge was quite used to bangs in November but usually Guy Fawkes had been celebrated and forgotten at the beginning of the month. In 1950 the bangs "explosions" said the paper came at the end. Newspaper reporters scurried round to find the cause. Was it yet another fire at the Cavendish Laboratory there had been two within eight months earlier in the year, or were the Civil defenders rehearsing their plans to see how the town would cope in the event of attack.

The Laboratories still stood intact, there was no broken glass in college courts yet Cambridge had undergone a radical transformation. Sixteen giant elm trees each older than the buildings they framed had been dynamited along the Backs. It was just the latest stage in the removal of the mature trees in that area.

The Avenue at Trinity College had been removed in 1948; that at St Johns was to follow in 1951. Elms have been the victim of many attacks. As early as 1922 those lining Brooklands Avenue were being described as dangerous; 180 had been planted in about 1850 but disease was taking its toll. By 1937 50 had been destroyed, by 1940 the disease was so endemic that there was no point in planting new. In 1950 only 92 of the trees remained and they were coming down at the rate of between one and five a year. Parker's Piece trees were dangerous by 1962, a decade before the notorious outbreak of Dutch Elm Disease which is still so lamented and which led to the removal of a particularly rare specimen from the corner of Drummer Street in 1978.

Trees have a finite life. In 1912 the Lombardy Poplar at Hyde Park corner originally planted by Julian Skrine in the garden of his house Lensfield was cut down and with it went part of old Cambridge. It had been under threat before: in 1864 when the Improvement Commissioners had debated alterations on the corner, in 1888 when the new Catholic Church was being planned; in 1901 underground toilets had been constructed beneath its branches but now it was victim to the ravages of time.

In 1894 however perfectly good trees were being uprooted in Victoria Avenue to benefit farmers. The Royal Agricultural Show was to be held on Midsummer Common and people feared that the rows of trees newly planted to soften the impact of the great new roadway carved across the common to carry traffic to and from the new Victoria Bridge would be damaged. So they were dug up, to be replanted in Chesterton and replaced once the Show had departed.

New trees have often been planted for special occasion. In 1897 limes along Chesterton Road were seen as one way of celebrating Queen Victoria's Jubilee. The willow population along the River Cam will be greatly enhanced to commemorate the centenary of the Cambridge Evening News in 1988

Despite the replacement programme along the Backs themselves it will be generations before residents and visitors will once more witness the magnificent trees most of which vanished, unrecorded and unremarked except when the saw and axe have given way to more dramatic methods of felling.

Stories from a year 1951

Slaughter House Lane was just inside the Kings Ditch the ancient trench that had been dug around Cambridge to act as a defence, linking the river in the north to the river in the west. The name indicates the chief occupation of the area and the offal and waste from the slaughtered animals found a ready home at the bottom of the ditch, contributing to the stench and smell that pervaded the area.

Later the site became known as Hog Hill and once more animals were in evidence but this time live animals for sale from the Beast Market. It was this site that was chosen for the Corn Exchange which opened in 1842.

Seven years later the Market Hill area was devastated by a fire and when the ashes had cooled the debate began on how best to make use of this new opportunity to redevelop the commercial centre of the town. The present square market is one result of the deliberation.

A second consequence was more slowly realised and necessitated much debate, argument, revision of plans and recourse to the House of Lords. Eventually however in 1876 a New Corn Exchange was opened right beside the Old.

The question as to what was to be done with the Old building occupied many minds. For a while it was used as an indoor market the Cambridge Arcade but perhaps it was too far from the mainstream of shopping and it closed in 1884.

For a while the building stood empty until Ernie Hayward, an enterprising local concert promoter, opened it as a variety music hall and enjoyed considerable success. The long frost between December 1894 and March 1895 was its downfall.

The cold weather prompted another enterprising businessman, Mr Bartholomew, to install floodlights so people could skate on a specially flooded area of Grantchester Meadows through the hours of darkness. This combination of a popular pastime and the novelty of floodlighting caught the imagination of those patrons who ought to have been flocking into the Arcade Music Hall. Even the prospect of a Marie Lloyd concert was insufficient attraction and the theatre closed shortly before the thaw came.

From 1895 to 1914 the Old Corn Exchange was used as a cycle repair shop, benefiting from its position adjacent to the Downing Street and New Museums laboratories whose students might learn the high technology physics but preferred to let others tend to their low technology bicycles. Subsequently the motorist was also catered for just one of the many garages which have now disappeared from central Cambridge.

Then in January 1951 came demolition the site was more useful than the old, listed, building for car parking. Now in January 1989 work is supposed to start on the construction of a new Hotel complex, its deep foundations stretching into and below the old Kings Ditch, disturbing the remains and quite probably the smell of the animals dumped there hundreds of years ago.

Stories from a year - 1952

A dirty and neglected boy died of typhus fever in Abbey Street. There was nothing remarkable in that - it was all too common in that disgraceful area of Barnwell in the earliest years of Queen Victoria's reign. His father, a glazier, was perpetually drunk. But now he had repented of his sinful ways - "Oh, sir, there was no resisting the prayers and entreaties of that dying boy. He made me ashamed of myself, and I could not help reading the chapters which he had marked in his Bible for my own and his mother's benefit ... "

The student preacher loved to tell the story of the successful missionary work undertaken by himself and his college friends. They had ventured into the mean back streets of Barnwell to knock on doors and try to entice the children to God.

They found some response. "Women came to their doors to see so strange a sight as gownsmen visiting their homes on an errand of mercy ... some parents, acting upon the principle that gownsmen might be easily ... fleeced, wanted to know what they would be paid if the children were sent".

The idea of establishing a Sunday School for such an area was first discussed in 1827. They were granted the use of the Friends Meeting House and so the "Jesus Lane Sunday School" came into being.

On that first Sunday the room was packed with 220 children. "I shall not readily forget the shouting and uproar which saluted our ears on entering the building ... there never was gathered together such a set on unruly, boisterous, dirty, ragged children".

The initial issue of tickets for regular attendance was discontinued when it was discovered that similar designs were also distributed elsewhere and were bartered between children to be redeemed at Jesus Lane where twelve could be converted into a penny.

Fortified by their progress in spreading the word of God into a godless community the Sunday School went from strength to strength. It outgrew its original home and moved to King Street in 1833, but kept the old name.

Much remained to be done. A newspaper correspondent in 1853 reported "The abodes are cheerless, squalid; their occupants eye you with a restless, wistful glance ... all is poverty and barren dreariness ..." A clergyman recalled "Devil's Row" a "wretched heaven-forsaken haunt of men ... the focus of villany, the receptacle of dishonest spoil, the refuge of the petty thief and the fully developed scoundrel".

In 1865 the Jesus Lane Sunday School moved to Paradise Street and new buildings. Here for 70 years it remained a great institution with 5-600 children on the books and with many of its teachers going on to positions of distinction in Church and State. The Great War dealt a blow from which it never recovered. In 1936 the building was sold to the Boy Scouts Association and St Radegund's Hall erected to serve the new housing estates east of the railway

In August 1952 the Jesus Lane Sunday School finally closed after 120 years of devoted work, its building used for the new Church of St Stephen, its funds to support the work with youth now undertaken in every parish._

Early in January 1953 the Cambridge Daily News carried a notice of the death of Herbert Charles Banham, Alderman of the city and founder of the boat-building firm that carried his name. He had been in poor health for some time.

His father had been a boot and shoe dealer and Herbert took over that business on his father's death. But his heart was in boats and not boots. He was to do more to popularise motor-boating in Cambridge than anybody else, with thousands using his large passenger boats such as the Viscountess Bury and others discovering the fenland waterways in his feller of self-drive day boats and hire cruisers.

It was in 1906 that he started his boat-building activities at Riverside and by 1914 had a small fleet of boats; he had developed a boat building business and during the Great War built launches for the Russian navy.

When the war ended he bought a racing rowing boat business at Victoria Bridge and as the years passed his expertise in such boats became recognised with his firm constructing many of the eights used by University and college crews.

In the early days the rowing boats often competed for river space with the working boats - the various tugs that brought lines of barges into Cambridge, vessels like the Nancy and the Cutter, the first steam tug to work the Cam. This was owned and operated by the Dant family, who also operated the chain ferry at the Cutter Inn, Chesterton. When the barge trade declined in the 1890s the family auctioned the business and the land they owned became Banhams Boat Yard in 1927.

That year Herbert tried to revive the commercial trade on the river by running a large steel deisel-diven barge which he named 'Nancy II' to carry sugar from Kings Lynn for the Chivers factory at Histon. The enterprise proved unsuccessful not least because the boat was rather too large and had some difficulty both in passing through the locks on the Cam and in the tidal section of the river Ouse below Denver where it was found that when there was sufficient tide to float her clear of the bottom she was often unable to squeeze under the bridges.

Fortunately his hire craft were more profitable and during the Second War he supplied the Admiralty with whalers and high speed motor craft. He also operated at his own expense a fire float for the Auxiliary Fire Service, adapting one of his hire craft.. Postwar his business boomed. His boats were graphically described in the brochures the firm produced to entice holiday makers on to the fenland waterways and the company issued its own charts.

They were waters Banham knew well for he was a founder-member of the Cambridge Motor Boat Club and served as Vice-Commodore for 30 years before being elected Commodore in 1952. This was not the only election he won for in 1939 he began to represent East Chesterton on the borough council; ten years later his wife Cora took over whilst Herbert became an Alderman. The river which was his business and his hobby also became his duty not only as a Conservator of the Cam and member of the Sewage disposal committee but also serving on the committees of the Great Ouse River and Inland Waterways Boards.

In 1961 the firm he founded became part of the Pye Group and as work on the Elizabeth Bridge proceeded the old site had to be vacated, though the old chain ferry continued to ply across the river carrying engineers from one bank to the other. In 1973 Banhams executives bought back the boat hire and chandlery side of the business but in 1976 the firm moved its business to Ely. Attempts to move back during the 1980s were frustrated, they sold the 'Viscountess Bury', flagship of their fleet, and another chapter in Cambridge history closed._

Many of the old established collages have extensive cellars of fine wine but such luxuries might be thought low on the scale of a new foundation. Yet one of the first achievements of the new students of New Hall was to win a firkin of ale to supplement the fare supplied by the college. This they achieved by throwing themselves fully into the Poppy Day Rag activities and raising the highest total per head of any college.

October 1954 saw the arrival of 16 women students, selected following an entrance examination designed to test logical thought and power of expression and the combination of brains and charm brought articles in the Iraq Times, Rhodesia Herald and the Cairo Times. The girls were photographed with books and bicycles, with the college head and college gatekeeper - the same person - for, as they explained, "you try to be in by 11pm because otherwise Miss Murray has to sit up - we can't afford a porter yet".

Miss Rosemary Murray was more than that. She was the person who fixed any broken electrical equipment, who looked after the two college punts when they had a river frontage and tended gardens when they moved to Huntingdon Road. She served on numerous outside bodies, educational councils and commissions and became the University's first woman Vice Chancellor.

The starting point for the new college came in 1946 when a Memorial was presented to the Senate to consider what changes should be made in the status of women in the University. By December 1947 they had agreed to admit them as members, a change ratified by the King in April 1948. Girton and Newnham, the two established ladies colleges were formally recognised, but after a few years it was felt that more places were needed to balance the increasing numbers of male undergraduates. In July 1952 a meeting chaired by the Principal of Newnham established an Association to work for a third foundation for women and the die was cast.

Amongst the many difficulties to be tackled were finance, accommodation and name. Few responded to a fund-raising party to be hosted by R.A. Butler at 11 Downing Street but money came from educational trusts, individuals and colleges. A freehold site of "The Orchard" on Huntingdon Road was given to the new college by two daughters of Horace Darwin, though Sir Charles Darwin was unwilling for the family name to be used for the venture. By ballot supporters chose "New Hall" as an alternative.

But the first home for the new college was "The Hermitage", a large Guest House in Silver Street. The new building was soon overcrowded, a dining room full with 50 was overflowing with 80, people eating their meals in the college office whilst the cooks, striving to cope, were resorting to an old gas oven in the pantry to supplement the one in the kitchen.

Meanwhile fund raising efforts were boosted by donations from the National Union of Women Teachers and others whilst the Isaac Wolfson Foundation grant of £100,000 would go towards the new dining block. By 1962 work was underway - just part of a variety of developments along the Huntingdon Road which with the adjacent Fitzwilliam College was changing the overall character of the area. Electronic computers were brought in to reduce delays caused by the severe winter and the first part of new building was occupied in October 1964. Building activity was still apparent when the Queen Mother formally opened the College in June 1965, speaking of the foresight and courage that had led to its establishment, whose first President, by then Dame Rosemary Murray, retired in September 1981._

In September 1955 the first house was completed on the new Arbury Estate extension, an area that would take a large bite out of Cambridge's 4,337 housing waiting list. Monkman, the builders, took out an advertisement to emphasise the speed of their construction, started 1st June, occupied 17th September.

Others took much longer to complete their dream house. Several families responded to an advertisement in the local paper announcing a meeting for ordinary people who were prepared to co-operate to build their own homes. Cambridge Self-Build Society was set up and eventually they learned of some building plots in the barren fields and allotments off Milton Road. Soon however the landscape was changing as roads were laid and plots pegged out.

The men bought a second-hand cement mixer some scaffolding, some spades and the various bits and pieces needed to build a house. This included floodlights so work could continue long into the night as "Essex Close" started to rise. It was one way of beating the housing shortage. Post-war housing had started with pre-fabs as a temporary measure; 450 were built in Church End and Walpole Way, 100 in the Lichfield, Golding road area, another 40 at Gilbert Close. Mowlems erected concrete 'Easiform' houses at a cost of £1,400 providing dwellings within the capacity of people to pay, after all not everybody could afford 35/- (£1.75) per week!

By 1952 the Council had built 2,000 non-traditional houses since the war but when that year Ernest Marples opened the 5,000th Unity steel and concrete house he urged caution on those who advocated cutting costs by reducing standards "one had got to stop somewhere, otherwise we could be building little pigeon houses with one room upstairs and one down"

By 1954 there was a 15-year waiting list for council houses and nearly half of new buildings were set aside to re-house people living in some 1,250 "slum" dwellings. Not all residents relished departure to pastures new; their small houses might be over a century old, with a blank wall at the back, inadequate ventilation, lavatories or drainage but they were in the New Town or Fitzroy Street areas with their local amenities and community spirit.

The new Arbury was bleak and unwelcoming.

The Mayor urged the erection of large blocks of flats in the newly cleared area rather than taking acres of agricultural land but instead eyes turned to the County Council smallholdings and poultry farms on the north of the town, already separated from Milton Road by a line of houses. Gilbert Road had been established shortly after the Great War and sold off to speculative developers who had erected villas but other development had paused for the Second. Now it was all systems go again.

But as the vast estate mushroomed and new phases expanded towards Kings Hedges Road some thought it less of an estate than a New Town without the facilities of a new town. An Editorial of December 1968 described it as "an urban wilderness, a dormitory suburb with no life of its own"; others termed it "slumburbia", "like a prairie" and "completely soulless"

The plan unveiled in February 1955 had included provision for shops, schools, a pub, cinema and two churches. The cinema did not materialise but the church did. For a while the congregation met in individual houses but then an army hut was bought for their first church. In July 1957 Princess Margaret came to lay the foundation stone of the permanent building, returning nearly 20 years later for a service to celebrate its completion.

Other facilities have followed, adventure playground, community centre and according to the children who live there it is "a friendly place... I love Arbury and never want to move away"

Stories from a year, _1956...__

In April 1956 it was goodbye to the bandstand and with it a memory of the Titanic sank.

The bandstand in question had been constructed for the Royal Show held on Midsummer Common in 1894. The arrival of such a large showpiece event had caused considerable disruption: Midsummer Fair had been diverted to Stourbridge Common and the young trees that had been planted along Victoria Avenue just two years before were dug up moved to the other side of the river and replanted when the machinery and crowds had dispersed.

As the Common was brought back to normality so the bandstand was moved a few hundred yards to Christ's Pieces where it became the centre for much entertainment. Robert Austin remembered in 1956 how he had performed there as band boy, bandsman and conductor for over 45 years. He recalled the various local bands that had competed for public acclaim including the Volunteers Band forerunner of the Territorials, the bands of the Cambridge University Rifle Volunteers, Borough Police and the Cambridge Town Band, between all of whom there was intense rivalry.

It had been the Town Band that scored when they raised the record collection of over £35 mainly in coppers during a Sunday afternoon concert in aid of the 'Titanic' disaster victims following the tragic sinking in 1912.

However the Police had their own disaster when their inaugural trip to Coton had gone wrong. First the wagon that was to convey them had broken on Market Hill forcing the men in blue to dash to a waiting omnibus, leaving one of their colleagues to book the offending vehicle for obstruction! Then on departure the replacement carriage found itself bogged down to the axles in mud and when finally extricated the horses bolted coming down Madingley Hill throwing its passengers off on either side as it galloped away.

By comparison the Cambridge bandstand was very civilised - even though in the early days it was lighted by naked gas jets that usually blew out and had to be relit several times during a performance.

There was no enclosure of any kind and often a noisy crowd of shouting children and young hooligans would mingle right up to the edge of the bandstand leaving the audience well on the outskirts.

Popular concerts were very well supported: in 1910 a series attracted an average audience of 740 people which made a substantial profit, even at only one penny admission.

More serious music by contrast traditionally fared badly and the following year an attempt to promote a series of symphony concerts featuring such names as Henry Wood Edward Elgar and Thomas Beecham flopped badly. The largest audience attracted to the bandstand was in the late 1930s when the Cambridge Band, an amalgamation of the Town and Albion Bands, performed there only a few hours after being “on the air” at Broadcasting House in London.

But the Christ’s Pieces venue was also used for other functions; mass meetings of many kinds were addressed from its stage, open-air dancers swayed rhythmically around its columns and for a while Cambridge Men’s Brotherhood held an annual open-air service there

But in April 1956 it all passed away and no longer would its festoon of coloured lights compete with a lavish decoration of flowers to see which could out-rival the sunset whilst the band played at Cambridge’s favourite outdoor venue.

In May 1957 the talk was of a centrally heated leisure centre complete with swimming pool and roof-top tennis court and incorporating a magnificent dining room with a cellar stocked with every kind of wine. In addition a ballroom so popular that dances would be held in the afternoon otherwise nobody would be able to tear themselves away until the early hours of the morning. Four lifts serviced the complex. For maximum utility the building would double as a Council Chamber and be home for the Mayor. This City Councillors’ dream actually existed and was then being torn down to make way for shops and offices in St Andrews Street. Its official name was Ruberdome after the red brick of which it was built. Everyone knew it as Rance’s Folly

Henry Rance was born in Ely, son of the landlord of the Lamb Hotel. He had studied as a solicitor in Mildenhall before establishing an extensive practice in Cambridge about 1828. Forty years later he was elected to the Council becoming an Alderman and serving three years as Mayor. He also filled other hours in a multitude of public positions from visitor of Fulbourn Asylum to Conservator of the Cam. In 1884 he was presented with two solid silver fruit dishes in recognition of his civic service and died in London in May 1891.

His house outlived him. He had built it in the 1850s and part incorporated an office but it was in the magnificent dining room with its mathematical ceiling that Rance held council meetings during his second period as Mayor in 1882. His reputation for hospitality was lavish and several thousand pounds a year was spent on food and drink for his friends.

Young gentlemen of the University were welcomed into his home, where he offered them tuition and showed off his four hundred pictures. Perhaps a greater incentive was the superb ballroom, its floor laid by German experts, especially since Rance had attractive granddaughters who enjoyed dancing and seldom found themselves without a partner. Indeed so many of his guests found themselves so enraptured that they failed to notice the passing hours and were locked out of their college that Rance insisted on the afternoon start_

Henry was a donnish Downing man who enjoyed a varied and busy life but who disliked visiting the barber. Indeed it was said that he never spent more than a shilling on a haircut and only had one every eight weeks.

Nothing was the same after he left Cambridge. For a while the Liberal Club used his former home for their meetings but the flat roofed building was soon dismissed as a "Folly".

In May 1957 John Hales Tooke recalled its past glories in a newspaper article which appeared as the workmen were demolishing the giant extravagant, Hollywood style mansion.

CDN 19.2.1904

Cambridge Liberals have been turned out of their handsome home in St Andrew's Street. Few provincial political clubs have had such a palatial clubhouse with large lofty rooms, spacious hall and staircase with a terrace overlooking gardens. The deceased Alderman, Henry Rance, who built the extensive premises practically ruined himself in the process but conferred a great advantage upon hundreds of men who met there for social as well as political purposes. Members are now removed to a property in St Tibb's Row formerly occupied by a now defunct newspaper until new premises are completed on the site of the old Bird Bolt Hotel.

Mike Petty Stories from a year, 1958

In 1958 they found a solution to the eternal problem of car parking in Cambridge. Ever since the Honourable undergraduate C.S. Rolls had brought the first car to the town in 1897 the mechanical monster had proved a problem. By 1907 it was felt doubtful if any other town of similar size had so many cars and motorbikes as Cambridge in term time, cars that not only knocked over cows in Victoria Avenue but also kicked up dust, cars that exceeded the speed limit at their peril; a taxi driver being fined £2 for driving at 12 mph in 1909.

As traffic increased so new measures were urged to control them. In 1921 staggered lunch hours were being urged to relieve congestion and four years later one, _way traffic was introduced in Market Street and Petty Cury. But if moving cars created difficulties, finding somewhere to park was already the subject of considerable lament. In 1925 one motorist turned to verse to echo his frustration in rhymes that would be equally applicable today.

Relief was soon available with the opening of Drummer Street bus station but the area devoted to cars was soon found to be inadequate and in 1932 New Square car park was opened.

It proved only a temporary solution, by 1934 cars and bikes were often parked so closely in Petty Cury and Sidney Street that pedestrians could not find space to cross over. Parking restrictions were introduced in 1936 which limited motorists to just fifteen minutes, using different sides of the streets on odd or even days and more one-way systems brought into operation.

Already the idea of using commons for cars was being urged and in 1938 came the suggestion of an underground car park on Market Hill, which could double for an air raid shelter in the fast-approaching war_

The war-time restrictions on petrol eased the problem for a while but with its end in 1950 came a survey which showed that whilst 43,000 motorists used New Square and 59,000 parked on Market Hill the favourite parking area was at the rear of the Lion Hotel, attracting over 80,000 cars in a year. No wonder the Council had announced its intention way back in 1948 of acquiring it.

By 1951 it was felt that the lack of central parking was driving shoppers away but the Trades Council wanted parks on the outskirts of the town and all waiting banned.

Much depended on whether the Holford Report, the County's views on how the town should develop, was implemented. The debate and arguments rumbled on... enlarge Lion Yard (1954), scrap Lion yard and Build on the outskirts instead (1956). 1957 saw a plethora of plans ... parking meters in February, Park Street multi-storey car park in April, under Parker's Piece in May. The Parker's Piece plan was deferred until October, the Park Street plan was deferred until the Parker's Piece plan had been discussed, the parking meters idea came up again ... and in the context of all this came the new idea. One morning in June 1958 Cambridge awoke to find that the Undergraduates had come up with their own solution.

Whilst some were saying put cars in the air, and others wanted them underground they had taken action.

Parked neatly on top of the roof of the Senate House was an Austin 7 van. It had arrived there overnight and stayed for several days, finally having to be cut into sections before it could be brought down, perhaps a high price to pay for free parking in central Cambridge!

Stories from a year 1959...

James Ratcliffe had been a dealer in earthenware back in the 1790s and had always paid up whenever he crossed Silver Street Bridge - if he was caught by the toll keeper. Sometimes however he came to Cambridge early and left late so that he got away without.

William Royston a farmer at Hardwick reported that when he'd crossed the bridge and paid the toll they had the wagon marked with chalk a different colour for each day. Sometimes they arranged the load so the collector could not see it above the side of the cart and were not charged.

Such were the dodges but Mrs Norris an old widow woman was toll-collector in 1760 knew most of the tricks as she hobbled along with her stick and the pitcher in which she put the money she took.

For as long as people could remember Cambridge Corporation had demanded a toll of 2d for every loaded wagon that came into town claiming that they needed the money to pay for the upkeep of the streets and bridges.

However others pointed out that as a result of an 1788 Act of Parliament these responsibilities had been transferred to a new body, the Cambridge Improvement Commissioners, who were authorised to levy taxes for road repairs. Why then should people pay twice and what was the money being spent on?

The Editor of the Cambridge Independent Press was sure he knew: "on scenes of riot and gluttony on feasts monthly annual and occasional on every pretext on midnight orgies for councillors".

In 1824 Messrs Beales and Company refused to pay the tolls and were taken to court. The trial involved extensive readings from ancient documents going back to Domesday Book. The hearing lasted for a day and a half by the end of which the Lord Chief Justice was "so inaudible from exhaustion" that he could scarcely be heard as he summed up the case. The jury had no doubts in deciding the Corporation had no right to the tolls they had hitherto collected. Two more cases followed. The Corporation won the second but lost the decider.

All of that was very annoying especially as the bridge itself was in need of a total rebuild. Public subscriptions were sought towards the cost of £1,956 and the work entrusted to Charles Finch. At his foundry on the Market Hill he cast the iron span that made the new bridge which opened in 1841 virtually the twin of the Great Bridge in Magdalene Street. Sadly it failed to last as well.

An inspection in 1913 revealed the need for repair and by 1950 it was found to be unsafe. Both Queens' College and the Anchor public house were opposed to anything that involved extensive pile-driving fearing damage to their own foundations. A design by Sir Edwin Lutyens was accepted and work started in July 1958 with the erection of a temporary footbridge.

Inevitably there were complications but in March 1959 the bridge reopened to traffic. Then just when everything appeared to be finished the workmen were back digging up the surface pumps were sent for and dams sunk. Some said contractors had hit an underground river, others that the bridge was sinking, that the banks had started to subside and anyway the thud of the pumps was ruining the summer.

But by August 1959 all was settled: Cambridge had a new Silver Street bridge and traffic was again free to cross it though there was still money to be paid to council coffers should it actually want to park.

Stories from a Year – 1960 (slightly reduced)

“In the evening of Thursday the 2nd of July, the lofty wooden bridge over the Cam ... frequently called the Mathematical Bridge broke down. It had been in a decayed state for a considerable time, and boards had been put up several days previous to its falling in, to prevent persons going over. The bridge was erected in the year 1768, from a design by the late Mr James Essex, an eminent architect”

In these words the Cambridge Chronicle of 12th July 1810 records one incident in the story of the bridge at Garret Hostel Lane. The same issue contains a notice of proposals for a cast-iron bridge proposed near Queens' College in place of the 'New Bridge'. It would be adjacent to the other Essex Bridge, the wooden structure he had erected to designs by Etheridge some 20 years previously. This was later rebuilt in 1902 and is itself now known as the “Mathematical Bridge”

The collapse of Garret Hostel caused a problem for travellers, for whereas the college bridges are principally for college people, Garret Hostel was for everybody. The lane had been given to the town by King Henry VI so that its citizens might have access to the river – for he had closed many of the other lanes that used to lead to the riverside wharves when he commandeered the land needed for his new King's college.

Time after time the bridge needed repair and the bills were shared jointly between Trinity Hall and the town of Cambridge. Finally the collage had contributed their half of the expense of building Essex's 'Mathematical Bridge' on the understanding that they would be free from all future claims. So the town paid for it to be patched up. It was soon in trouble again – a wooden bridge just did not have the permanence required.

In 1835 tenders were sought for a cast-iron bridge. The contract was awarded to the Butterley Iron Company and the work undertaken by Finch's iron foundry, a local company famous for such work. The result was a fine bridge in the Gothic style which featured on as many postcard views as some of its older college neighbours. Despite their earlier agreement Trinity Hall contributed over a quarter of the cost of £960 19s 6d with other colleges joining in.

But by 1959 the bridge was in the news again, settlement having caused the cast iron to fracture, making repairs essential but uneconomic. This time it was not the college but one of its students who picked up the bill. The Trusted Family had been associated with Trinity Hall for 50 years and Sir Harry Trusted, Q.C., decided that a tangible way of recognising the link would be to build the new bridge.

His intention was a bridge that would be an honest example of twentieth century craftsmanship, aiming to please present and future generations. The result was unveiled in October 1960. It won praise for its design, but not from cyclists – some felt the gradient was so steep that only the fittest could bike over it, another that it was an ideal training ground for mountaineers. 40 years on it still taxes the muscles of all who cross it.

Kings Parade was the most miserable street in Cambridge – wherever one looked there was anguish – so ran one old saying about the street, alluding to the names displayed above the shop fronts where Sadd, Greef, and Pain could be found.

In 1914 Mr. A. H. Sadd moved his old-established Curiosity shop around the corner into St. Edwards Passage, breaking the sequence. He then added to the misery felt by the rest of the town when he threw himself to his death by leaping from the top of Kings College chapel.

“Miserable” is not a word often applied to the Chapel itself. Usually it is praised in glowing terms – “the unparalleled ornament of all England” – and others have climbed to the roof, like Sadd. In March 1627 the Duke of Buckingham, favourite of King Charles I and Chancellor of the University, refused to take part in what was then the custom of having the shape of his foot, together with his name and arms cut in the lead of the roof. – it was, he said, too high for him. However later that year an Antiquarian visitor escorted his new bride to the same height where she left her dainty footprint – one of the smallest in England, but then she was only 13 years old!

In 1660 the Cambridge town band played music from the top of the Chapel and soldiers fired a volley of shots to mark the Restoration of King Charles II. Although Cromwell’s men had used the chapel as a drill hall the famous stained glass had been spared the widespread destruction that was ordered elsewhere by William Dowsing.

The chapel bells were also intact at the time, hanging in a wooden building to the west of the chapel which by 1728 was in such a poor condition that the bellringer, Henry West, was crushed to death when one fell on him. The building was demolished in 1739 and the bell sold for scrap 15 years later.

Some have arrived at the chapel in sedan chair – such as Andrew Snape college Provost, who suffered badly from gout and needed to be lifted into his stall. Others have arrived in dead of night. William Grimshaw and Richard Kidman got a key to the outer door in 1800, and for several nights let themselves in and steadily worked their way picking the other locks that stood between themselves and a valuable collection of college coins and medals. Grimshaw, however, became scared – “the place looked so awful, that he trembled every time as if he had the ague” and he left Kidman to it. Both were caught and transported to Australia.

In March 1961 the College announced that they had been offered the gift of a work of art of the very first rank – the painting of the Adoration of the Magi by the Flemish painter Peter Paul Rubens. It had been recently purchased for a world record price of £250,000 by Major Alfred Allnatt who had been searching for an appropriate ecclesiastical building in which to display it.

In November the heavy wooden panel, measuring 12ft by 9ft, arrived in a 30ft lorry and trailer, escorted by two security guards and an Alsatian dog, concerned less about robbery than a student rag. Ten men took two hours to get the picture to the chapel doors and the 13 hundredweight masterpiece was winched on to a giant easel beside the chapel screen where it was to stay whilst they worked out quite how to display it as an altarpiece.

In April 1964 it was moved to the East end, and four years later, confirmed in its position following a major restoration. Not all agree that the Adoration and the setting complement each other. As one man wrote to the Cambridge News in December 1968; “The restored Chapel at King’s College is magnificent but I feel that if the Rubens was moved to the right, say as far as the Fitzwilliam Museum, it would look even better.

Funerals are sombre affairs mourners follow the hearse with reverence and sadness and the deceased despatched with due dignity

But undergraduates sent down for committing some breach of University discipline were once given a more rousing send off in a tradition known as a Mock Funeral Enid Porter recorded how the body of the student attended by a surpliced "clergyman" was usually carried from his College on a board and placed in a waiting cab. This then drove off towards the station followed by the "choir" and a crowd of "Mourners" in various strange costumes. The journey would be enlivened by strident music the singing of hymns and popular songs and the reading of "Lessons" from Gray's "Anatomy or some other textbook depending on the subject which the expelled man had been reading. At the station the "corpse would be placed in the guard's van and the "nails knocked in the coffin" by undergraduates who clambered on the roof and hammered on it with brooms.

On one occasion in 1920 the "body" escaped from the van and the huge crowd of mourners stormed the buses waiting outside the station and rode back to the centre of town followed by cars filled with shouting undergraduates. They eventually caught up with the "dead man" as he was walking back in procession to the Market Place with the "clergyman" and the "choir. Traffic in Cambridge ground to a halt as the streets became clogged, causing public annoyance.

More offence was caused in 1910 when the cortege included members of the Cambridge University Officer Training Corps in uniform and with rifles reversed. This was thought to be in bad form since it was soon after the funeral of King Edward VII. The following years saw two other Mock Funerals which prompted the University authorities to try and ban them although the practice reoccurred spasmodically. One example was in 1921 when the University were considering whether to award degrees to women. A colossal mock funeral was held for "The death of the Varsity with the corpse of the last male undergraduate being borne on a bier surrounded by aged mourners whose long grey beards dragged in the dust.

Another was in 1962 when 2 undergraduates were sent down for failing their examinations. This time their sports car was pulled through the streets and despite the stir it caused it was according to Miss Porter "a poor affair compared to the elaborate ones of the past"

Many of the old traditions have died out and the town is more peaceful for it.

One such was the "Chariot of fire" in 1920 when a hansom cab was commandeered and set alight before being driven around Market Hill. Although the cabbie was well compensated, and their companions hoped for similar treatment for their ancient vehicles others would have been concerned at the treatment of the horse pulling the blazing vehicle. The exercise was repeated in 1921 when the Chariot collided with the telephone kiosk and in 1945 when a landau was soaked in petrol set alight and paraded through the town.

It was quite usual for bonfires to be started by students ripping the wooden shutters from shops pulling up garden fences or gates to add to the blaze. In 1900 the underground toilets on the Market then under construction were raided for fuel to celebrate the relief of Ladysmith and such was the damage caused in 1905 that the University authorities paid £200 compensation to townsfolk who had had to defend their property against the undergraduate mob. Damage of a similar sum was caused in 1959 following the roughest November 5th for 20 years when a banger battle was fought in the town centre. But perhaps the worst incident was in 1948 when it was not a banger that was thrown at the Senate House but a hand grenade and it was fortunate there was no real funeral to follow that example of youthful high spirits.

Stories from a year 1963...

In July 1963 a Princess met a Viscountess that had once been the plaything of the Prince of Wales. The Viscountess was then seventy, five years old, thick skinned and still watertight, though the original spark that she used to derive from 200 storage batteries had long been extinguished. Indeed a petrol engine had been substituted some time after the Prince had become King Edward VII in 1901. The "lady" in question was named after the wife of Viscount Bury who when in Canada during the 1870s had met the American inventor, Edison and discussed the possibilities of electric vehicles. The initial experiments proved negative but the Viscount found more success with an Electric Launch Company who's largest and finest boat was named "Viscountess Bury".

For four seasons she was on charter to the Prince of Wales but then became a public passenger launch plying the Thames. In 1910 she was acquired by H.C. Banham of Cambridge and brought around the East coast and down the Ouse to the Cam. It was here in 1911 that Bill Leach fell in love with her when as a boy he paid his sixpence to take a trip down to Clayhithe, admiring the bright varnish and polished brass of what had once been described as "the largest electric launch in the world".

But the "Viscountess" was not the only boat to ply the Cam in those days. Steam tugs such as the "Nellie" and "Olga" were still to be seen and the large 70 ton steam barge "Nancy" plied regularly to Cambridge bringing timber from Kings Lynn until August 1914. In 1927 "Nancy II" took to the rivers, a diesel barge bought by Banhams from Holland she was really too large and was taken out of service after nine months.

But in addition to the business craft there were the pleasure boats.

One such was the "Idle Hour", originally a workboat at Kings Lynn, which was fitted with a steam engine by Lack of Cottenham. Soon renamed "Dove" she capsized and sank beneath a boat builder's shop in 1914. It was here that Bill Leach's brother discovered her in 1926 and between them they managed to make the wreck float and steam again. The success was short-lived, soon the boiler was useless and the hull a mere receptacle for fallen leaves in a forgotten corner of another boatyard. When his brother left to build roads in Africa the hulk became the property of the Cambridge schoolteacher. An amateur poet and playwright, an expert renovator of grandfather clocks and with an abiding love for things mechanical A.F. Leach inspired his pupils, fascinated them with tales of travel and, occasionally took them for trips down the river. They might return covered in sooty smuts but each had his turn at stoking the furnace of the steamboat that he rebuilt and renamed "Phoenix".

For twenty years this relic of a bygone age could be seen steaming up the river, a dirty, stinking old thing" to some, a source of unmitigated delight to its owner. And if a Viscount could name a boat after his wife, then so could a teacher, and "Kathleen" became as much of a character as her Royal neighbour on the Cam. In 1952 the dream had to end, the hull was just too weak to take any more pupils on river trips. But Leach was not finished, he acquired another, rebuilt and refurbished, polished and perfected until once more he owned the largest, finest and fastest steamboat on the river Cam.

Princess Margaret was just one of thousands who has been entertained on the "Viscountess Bury" and the memory has faded, but to thousands of his pupils the fond memory of the late and lamented "Steamboat Bill" Leach will remain fresh.

In April 1964 Kings College chapel authorities watched with trepidation as the great Rubens painting of the Adoration of the Magi was repositioned as an altar-piece.

The artist had visited Cambridge and been awarded an Honorary M. A. by the University but his painting had been commissioned by the White Sisters of Louvain who were in a hurry and, tradition has it, the job was completed in just eight days. They had paid Reubens 920 florins for it in 1634, but it cost a world record price of £275,000 when purchased by Major A. E. Allnatt who gave it to the College in 1961.

At first it had been installed on scaffolding beside the screen but now it was being moved to a giant steel support specially designed for it. Great care had to be devoted to ensure that the wood on which it is painted did not flex and crack as it was lifted into place.

Any change to the great chapel was sure to create controversy and the Adoration was no exception. How much more debate and concern must have been shown when the great stained glass windows themselves were removed.

Overnight the glass disappeared, stripped from the windows by a group of students, packed in hampers and buried in pits in the gardens, pits that were quickly filled in. By daybreak the deed was done. Passers by stared in amazement and the word spread rapidly. Soon crowds gaped and gossiped surely it was the work of Cromwell and his soldiers – typical of the desecration they were wreaking in churches throughout the Kingdom in 1637.

In fact this version was fiction, invented by a Clare college man, Sabine Baring Gould, and told in "The Chorister", a tale of the Civil War which ran to several editions in the 1890's.

But fiction turned to fact in 1939 with the outbreak of war. At a time when Cambridge residents were being told to sandbag windows to prevent damage during air raids, the Kings College authorities were themselves debating the steps needed to safeguard their stained glass. Some questioned the wisdom of removing the glass – what good would the glass be if the chapel itself was destroyed?

But other councils prevailed and the glass was taken down, the windows being boarded up for the duration of the war. The light and colourful interior became dark and sombre to match the mood of the time.

With peace came restoration. In April 1951 King George VI paid what was to be his last visit to Cambridge to join in the Thanksgiving Service for the completion of the task of replacing the glass.

Cambridge had escaped serious damage during that War as it had in the First. Then its citizens had flocked in to the colours after hearing of the destruction wreaked on the Belgian University town of Louvain – the original home of the “Adoration” that now graces Kings College Chapel.

Stories from a year: 1965

Things that went bump in the night troubled the light sleepers of Cambridge in the middle of the "Swinging Sixties". Some of the strange sounds could be traced to the Regal Cinema where the Rolling Stones rocked and P.J. Proby shocked his act was "too smutty" and was banned. At Cherry Hinton the blame could be laid at the door of the Irish the Clancey Brothers topping the bill at the first Cambridge Folk Festival. Mill Road was learning to live with the rattle and clatter of a new phenomenon Ten P in Bowling but some of the worlds greatest brains startled at an unearthly noise right outside their bedroom windows.

Searchlights were brought in to scan the sky in just the same way that in Reach during the Great War one old lady took her candle to investigate the ghastly, ghostly shape said to hover just above the trees.

Elsewhere through the centuries others have run towards or away from such strange sights, some glimpsed flying horsemen amongst the clouds, others saw creatures descend from them to the ground beneath ...

Near Soham in 1785 an old man and a boy had witnessed an apparition that descended from the heavens into the field in which they were working. The lad had fled, his companion had stood his ground too scared to move; then seeing the shape appearing motionless he approached it "in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, what are you, speak and tell me" ...

History shows that such appearances often heralded momentous occasions Coronations or celebrations yet in 1965 there was little of moment the appointment of RAB Butler to Trinity, the opening of New Hall, the proposed merger between Cambridge's two football clubs. Nor could the monumental decision to abolish the need for undergraduate gowns after dark account for an incident of such magnitude.

They were troubled times. "Peace in Vietnam" banners on the pinnacles of Kings College Chapel showed concern for the International situation, and Cambridge was all too aware of the impact of attack from the air the scrapnell wounds still visible in the Bridge Street walls of Whewell's Court combined with memories of the bombing of the Union Society just twenty odd years before. The Kaiser had promised no zeppelin attacks on Cambridge such as the one that had brought Reach villagers to panic yet still one had been photographed over the town. As daylight broke on 27th October 1965 hard headed academics witnessed a fairytale come true. But instead of a beanstalk tempting Jack to climb into the clouds there was a steel cable and far above a wartime barrage balloon was hovering. It had broken away from R.A.F. Cardington carrying its weather instruments with it and dragged its wire rope thirty miles across country before becoming hooked on scaffolding at St Johns College. Nearly two hundred years earlier other students had launched balloons from Emmanuel and Queens' but in 1965 Magdalene College was evacuated whilst this one was winched to the ground. The Soham labourer had advanced and poked his collapsed balloon but now firemen carefully avoided protrusions that might pierce the hydrogen filled canopy and cause an explosion. It all passed peacefully but one speculates on the nineteen sixties headlines had the balloon as it descended been found to be carrying Mr Green and his aeronautical pony a regular eighteen attraction|

Stories from a year 1966

In the mid 1960s the "in-place" for the young set was a dimly lit beat club in Falcon Yard off Petty Cury. The Alley was cheap membership just 5/-(25p), the music groovy and the company good. In February 1966 however there were unexpected and uninvited guests when Cambridge police descended on force. As dogs guarded the entrance the dancers were searched nothing was found in their pockets but on the floor were pieces of Indian hemp cannabis.

The drug menace had also spread to University students and two Peterhouse men were each fined £50 for smoking hashish; estimates suggested that about 500 local youths were experimenting with drugs with reports that chemistry graduates were actually manufacturing LSD in Cambridge. Police set up a drugs squad amidst claims that the city was the drug distribution centre for the Eastern Region

Similar reports had been current over a century before when fenland folk were recognised as being largely dependent on opium.

In many local towns and villages it took the place of drink. The Privy Council was told in 1864 that one housewife in Lincolnshire was known to have spent £100 on the drug, and that many men never drank beer without dropping a piece of opium into it whilst brewers added narcotics to their brew, to the great surprise of any visiting drinkers.

It was thought the drug was needed to combat the rheumatic pain or "ague" that locals were prone to whilst others claimed it relieved the depression during the hard times.

Much of the farm work was undertaken by labour gangs of women and children who worked long hours in the fields and needed to leave their babies unattended for periods. It was found that a little poppy head tea was efficient at keeping the infants docile: "The young 'uns all lay about the floor like dead 'uns, and there's no bother with 'em. When they cry we give 'em a little of it - p'raps half a spoonful, and that quiets them, sometimes when they're hungry, and the victuals isn't ready for 'em, we give 'em a drop too".

It also led to an extremely high infant mortality rate. Opium was openly sold throughout the area and Charles Kingsley in his novel Alton Lock has a parson being told "yow goo into druggist's shop o'market-day, into Cambridge, and you'll see the little boxes, dozens and doozens, a'ready on the counter; and neve a venman's wife goo by, but what calls in for hapennard o'elevation, to last her out the week...well it keeps women-folk quiet, it do; and its mortal good agin ago pains"^^

The women were thought to be the major consumers with their dependence perhaps originating from "tasting" the opiates they gave to their children and preferred to spend money on drugs rather than doctors' bills.

A reporter in 1850 found one woman in Ely, suffering from a broken hip; she had been bedridden for six years. "The exhilarating effects of her last dose had passed off, and had given place to that wretched lowness of spirit in which the life of an opium-taker alternates. As the repulsive-looking hag sat upright in her filthy bed by the chimney corner, her uncouth and cadaverous features streaked by the various courses her tears had taken in her intervals of despondency. With her tangled grey hair hanging over her shoulders, her shrunken neck, and withered arms which were exposed to view as she rolled up another pill of the filthy-looking drug, and raised it trembling to her discoloured lips, presented a spectacle more loathsome than imagination could conceive".^_

Might the same description apply today of the trendy young things of the dingy 60's discos who so fondly believed they were into something new.

Stories from a year by Mike Petty – 1967

The 1960's were a great period of undergraduate activity in Cambridge. There seemed to be a different sort of students – tailors had noticed a drop in their trade – 80% were now on grants and the fashion was for informal clothes with a trend to jeans & duffle-coats, sloppy-joes & 17" trouser bottoms. Nor did they hold with old tradition of wearing gowns after dark. A campaign of civil disobedience was staged with 150 students marching disrobed through the town and queuing to give their names to the University proctors.

Freedom to of dress was one thing, of expression something else. The Undergraduate magazine Granta, was censored after its editor, David Frost, included a poem entitled "Highwayman 474" which used a 4-letter word. There were bans too on Market Hill – at least on bonfire night 1960 when 200 police patrolled to prevent a repetition of the £200 worth of damage caused the previous year. The exercise was successful, the ban stayed. But explosions in 1962 brought a storm of protest, one Civil Defence worker pulling on his uniform before realising that it was only fireworks set off at a May Ball – the traditional celebration when "Popsey expresses" pulled into the station and the city filled with young girls anxious to sample the good life.

But college life was not all fun and in 1962 the Cambridge Samaritans branch started after 6th student suicide in year and a mock funeral took to the streets as two young men were sent down for failing their examinations.

The decade was one of innovation – the first organised rag procession of floats, the King Street run accomplished in a record 28 minutes, and in 1965 Queens College scrapped its strict male-female segregation rule making way for a new foundation that would take both sexes – a decision welcomed by the Union Society which had now opened its doors to women and in 1967 elected its first woman president, Anne Malleliu.

It was time of political awareness; a "Peace in Vietnam" banner fluttered from the pinnacles of Kings College chapel and visits by the US Ambassador, Harold Wilson and Dennis Healey all provoked protests leading the Police Federation to call for curbs on student political demos. University authorities brought in new restrictions but Police needed to mount the biggest security exercise then organised when Reginald Maudlin came to Cambridge to explain the reasons which had prompted him to deny permission for wounded German activist "Red" Rudi Dutschke taking up a place at Clare college. The newly formed Cambridge Students Union took up the case and mounted its first ever national march in London.

Student power was recognised by the University authorities setting up a consultative committee of undergraduates, graduates and senior members too but with sit-ins supporting LSE protesting students and gowns being burned on the Senate House lawns it was no wonder Cambridge attracted international press attention in 1969. Or rather one undergraduate did – a certain young man whose arrival at Trinity College could not go unnoticed but whose subsequent presence in the City passed largely unreported as he quietly pursued his studies despite the distractions of National and local life – such as the 1970 "Garden House riot" when police invoked the Riot Act against protests against holidays in Greece. But there were headlines too when that special student took part in a play, made his maiden speech in the Union Society and crowning a May Week Queen, as he himself had been earlier crowned at Carnarvon.

Stories from a year 1968 by Mike Petty

It might have world-wide implications but consider the environment Cambridge was no place for it. News of a dream machine that would whisk people at 300 mph bring Edinburgh a mere one hour away from London and high speed rail link with London's third airport excited many but appalled some. "A monster of steel and concrete will now drive an ugly path along the haunts of snipe and redshank.

The wild ducks dropping in on whickering wing will be frightened off by a three hundred mile an hour monster humming through the winter twilight" wrote naturalist John Humphreys.

The engineers argued that the site they needed, 20 miles without a bend, could only be found between the two Bedford rivers running north from Earith and the River authority raised no objections. Others thought back to the problems which had faced the early railway pioneers as they laid their metal track across the unstable fenland, sometimes needing to drive piles to combat the shrinking peat, and at Lt Thetford was shrinking at an inch a year whilst that under the embankment at Prickwillow had dropped over six feet since it was constructed in 1845. Their doubts were reinforced when one of the large concrete beams that were being installed to provide the elevated track for the new hovertrain collapsed in August 1970. But by then some of the problems had been ironed out.

Notable amongst these had been where the headquarters for the new Company was to be based. Milton, Bar Hill, Chatteris and Ely had been prime candidates as far as the "engine drivers of March and strawberry growers of Wisbech" were concerned, but what could such county councillors know of the needs of Cambridge.

Tracked Hovercraft Ltd wanted to be in the city to be near the specialists of the University Physical Department but County officials were adamant that this would infringe their strict controls on industry within the city.

By March 1968 there was a state of war between the two authorities with attacks on the "pernicious stranglehold" that was preventing Cambridge from developing as a regional centre. But then a little local knowledge ensured success as the Company abandoned their original plans and instead set up next door on land in Ditton Walk that already had permission for industrial use.

Now the County Council had been beaten there were just the French to compete with. Their project might be further advanced but ours was better. Nor would the noise from the test bed in the fens disturb grazing cattle, nor the vibration interfere with isolated cottages or disrupt fishing. This British "Concorde of terra firma" would be racing away from its rivals with advanced linear motors that would whisk the Hovertrain high above the boggy fen. The weather had other ideas as the first public launch had to be cancelled due to fen fog but by December 1971a Staggering 12 mph had been obtained. By August 1972 they were up to 72 mph, and had permission to build more track.

The Japanese were interested and the British Government reconsidering the venture as funds ran down. January 1973 saw speeds in excess of 106 mph and local MPs urging for a speedy decision on the project's future. Next month came the news, it was to be scrapped with parts sold off to other companies, a decision that brought uproar in the House and complaints of short-sightedness, pessimism, lack of initiative and incompetence.

A Select Committee was scathingly critical of the decision to abandon the project, the one major centre in the country of a new technology. They also attacked the way that the workers had been bundled out of their Ditton Walk offices within 36 hours of the announcement of the cancellation.

But not all were upset as the Earith site was finally dismantled and the fens went back to their isolated peace.

Stories from a year 1969

Rag Day is now regarded as a traditional part of Cambridge life, a day on which anything may happen.

"Rags" defined as a "noisy disorderly scene" have been part of University life for many years but usually involved pitched battles with police, destruction and general hooliganism.

For example in 1904 undergraduates surged through the streets and attempted to start a bonfire on Market Hill. A contingent of mounted police charged the crowd which fled down Petty Cury where a confectioner's shop window was broken and various sweets looted. From there the mob spread towards Parker's Piece where they ripped up railings from three houses and started a fire. Anything that would burn was seized including a watchman's shelter which was smashed with pickaxes and added to the blaze.

Once again police tried to disperse them, succeeded in making an arrest and conveyed the prisoner to the police station despite determined efforts to free him. Once safely inside the crowd attempted a rescue, hurling missiles at policemen guarding the entrance. Meanwhile another fire was started on New Square and the bandstand on Christ's Pieces had to be defended to prevent it being added to the flames. Another police charge was needed before the mob was cleared and the blaze on Parkers Piece finally extinguished by the Fire Brigade amidst the jeers and sneers of onlookers.

It was horseplay of this sort and the fear of further disturbance so near Bonfire Night that prompted the town authorities to refuse the British Legion permission to organise Poppy Day collections for a number of years. But then they took the bold step of allowing the University to participate and on the 10th November 1922 the first Poppy Day rag was held. A procession of "animals" toured the town with a police escort and was hailed as one of the happiest Rags ever seen. It started a tradition that continued until recent times and raised thousands of pounds for the Earl Haig appeal.

The first organised procession of floats was held in 1963 but shortly afterwards everything seemed to fall apart. Many colleges began to boycott the Rag, wanting the money collected to go to other groups as well as the Legion appeal. Following great debate and public concern other charities were added to the list but people became less tolerant of flour bombs, rotten tomatoes, water pistols and eggs and in 1967 the "Poppy Day" rag was held for the last time, its demise marked with fighting between students and local youths.

When revived in February 1969 the event flopped many people did not even know it was on subsequent years attracted little more support and by 1974 enthusiasm was reported at an all time low. Jubilee Year 1977 saw a revival in its fortunes and in 1980 the organisation was taken over by the Cambridge Students Union who succeeded in uniting town and gown and making the Rag a unifying rather than divisive feature of Cambridge life.

Mike Petty Stories from a year 1970

It was March 1836 when Cambridge first saw a police force established under the Municipal Corporations Act. The initial provision was for a total of 31 policemen who operated from The Mews in Millers Lane (now Emmanuel Street). After 16 years they moved to part of Hobson's Workhouse in St Andrews Street, premises which had provided shelter and employment for those in need but was also used as a house of correction for unruly and stubborn rogues.

The accommodation seems to have been more secure than that in the adjacent Spinning House, which University authorities used to imprison the numerous prostitutes who were attracted to a town full of young gentlemen undergraduates. There was uproar when one of the girls escaped through a window and went home to Dullingham. The Vice Chancellor ordered the police to rearrest her as a gaol breaker and at the trial at the Assize she was duly found guilty but such was the publicity attending the case that the Home Secretary intervened and ordered her release. More bad publicity followed and in 1894 the Vice Chancellor's power to send women to the Spinning House was abolished.

The old buildings were demolished and in October 1901 a large new police station was officially opened. Its Renaissance style front, groined ceilings and mosaic floors won it warm architectural praise and the modern speaking tubes and basement room for drying clothes and making coffee placed it in the forefront of police development nationally. James Sutton and Charles Smith were best able to testify to some of the other facilities for they were the first to sample the cells, one for stealing walnuts, the other for drunkenness.

Meanwhile on Castle Hill another police station had been opened in October 1879 to provide a base for the County Force, established in 1851 after much debate. The two forces worked side by side. Another small station was opened at Mitcham's Corner where it stood until 1930 when it was replaced by a police box.

As the service developed it assumed extra duties; from 1921 the Police not only fought crime but fires as well, replacing the Volunteer Fire Brigades, until the establishment of the Auxiliary Fire Service in 1938. All this put pressure on available space and the Council sought new accommodation. By 1940 they had identified a site on Parkside for a new Police and Fire station but numerous complications arose. Eventually the fire station – by then a County Council responsibility – was officially opened in 1965.

In that year the City and County police forces amalgamated with others – a development that had been anticipated by the appointment of a single Chief Constable for both forces in 1963 – and so it was that Frederick Drayton Porter was in charge when Parkside Police Station opened in October 1970 as the first major building undertaken by "Mid Anglia Constabulary". That force was itself restructured and renamed "Cambridgeshire Constabulary" in 1974.

The new building cost over £145,000 and included provision for Traffic Wardens, a garage block and parking as well as space for storing a large number of bicycles – an ever-present problem as the newspaper of 1910 recorded. "Cambridge", it said, "is an irresistible attraction for professional thieves down from London". It was commenting on the arrest of a gang caught loading bikes on to a train at the station – just one of the successes of the Cambridge bobby over the years.

“Clamp-down on tourist parties as pedestrians jams hit colleges”, read the headlines of July 1971. They might be echoed in virtually any other year, and have been repeated only weeks ago.

Cambridge has always been a centre of attraction, Kings and Queens, Emperors and Shahs have all made the journey and all experienced the difficulty of travel. Today the roads are congested, in days gone by they were rutted and the trip from London was something to be dreaded. In 1700 Edmund Ward set off from Bishopsgate in one of those romantic images of olden days -the stage coach. But Edmund found it "a dirty lumbering wooden hovel" and did not appreciate being crammed inside with his traveling companions, one of which was a young baby being violently ill at both ends!

With the coming of the railways in 1845 travel became much easier and by 1853 a guidebook commented that although some visitors still arrived by the "semi-barbarous" stagecoaches the much larger contingent now arrived by train. Such excursionists found themselves deposited on the outskirts of the town, forced out by University opposition which defeated numerous proposals for more central stations. Indeed the visitor who arrived on a Sunday might not find himself in Cambridge at all, since at first no trains were allowed to stop at the station on the Sabbath for fear that hordes of visitors would profane that Holy day for those who lived and worked in the University.

By 1912 there was pressure from railwaymen to advertise Cambridge like a seaside town to encourage visitors during the Long Vacation when the town -and its shops - traditionally closed down. Yet whilst some campaigned for more visitors, others condemned their too casual dress, especially in such areas as the Backs where there were complaints in 1937 of "nudity".

The American visitor was traditionally the butt of much humour. In 1910 one disgruntled commentator found them "so mean that it is absolutely unprofitable to have anything to do with them". Many came to know the area through their war service and when in 1950 US Travel Agency heads visited Cambridge they saw "vast potentiality".

Some of that potential was realised in 1951 when the Festival of Britain saw the establishment of an Information Bureau as part of the central Library. That year two undergraduates started to organise University tours three times a day attracting 100 people a week whilst many others showed themselves round using the little guide by Ruth Mellanby which had been published the previous year.

By 1964 it was felt that more tourists would be welcomed by traders and the residents would benefit from more entertainment during the quiet summer months; but those who did come complained that it was spoilt by parking difficulties!

As Cambridge has boomed as a tourist centre so the principal colleges experience more and more pressure, especially during the examination period, and have closed their gates to control the constant flow of visitors. Yet in the hard commercial world they have also promoted the use of their buildings for Conferences, rented rooms to the Language Schools that have multiplied in recent years and started charging admission.

In 1971 I organised a display in the Guildhall devoted to the historical development of Tourism. In opening it, the Mayor said "It is not the policy of the City Council to attract more visitors to Cambridge". He said so whilst standing in front of a photographic display just commissioned by the City Council to do precisely that!

Stories from a year –1972

The solution to the eternal parking problem did not survive the removal of the Austin 7 van in 1958. But the concept of cars above houses was that year approved not in Senate House Hill but in the prophetically named Park Street. Elsewhere homes in Doric and Gothic streets were demolished to make space for more motors and multi-storeys were proposed for Donkeys Common and King Street.

Others wanted parking meters, park and ride and underground car parks on Parker's Piece and Lion Yard.

Thus was the stage set and throughout the 1960's most of the alternative ideas were recycled.

Some action came in 1963 with the opening of Cambridge's first multi-storey, dwarfing Cambridge's last thatched cottage near Park Street but a proposed underground loop road from Emmanuel Road to Jesus Lane was quickly buried and Parker's Piece again rejected.

Then in 1964 came the first parking meters. The charges of 1/-(5p) an hour would "produce a profit of £10,000 a year and they would pay for themselves within three" (in fact by 1972 they had earned £101,000 and cost £145,000 in administration). Their immediate impact was to clear the streets, with long queues for car parks which were already full; traffic conditions were described as frightful and some traders reported a 78% dip in their takings.

Double yellow lines began to appear in March 1965, plans were drawn and debated and somebody suggested Parker's Piece again. Shoppers switched to the Fitzroy Street area where parking was easier and where the talk of redevelopment seemed as unlikely as anything actually happening in Lion Yard. Yet in the centre things were changing though not for the better. In 1969 parking meter charges were doubled and one of the long established parking spots was closed as cars were banned from Market Hill. That Christmas the chaos was such that police had to invoke emergency powers in an attempt to clear streets clogged solid by jammed cars.

Worse was to follow next year when another central parking area became home for builders' vans rather than shoppers' cars. At long last work had started on the Lion Yard scheme after over 20 years of debate and despite a last minute hitch when University dons objected to the proposed design.

Envisaged in the Holford Report of the 1950s at a cost of £160,000, it would now come to over £700,000. And while Holford had wanted 400 cars it would now take 550. Completion was only two years away and in the meantime the Queen Anne Terrace car park and Elizabeth Bridge were due in 1971 and there was talk of pedestrianisation, a Western Relief Road, a Northern bypass and even 100 more meters

Lion yard car park finally opened in July 1972. It was designed for shoppers, its prices pitched to discourage those who wanted to park their cars longer. Thus whilst parking for the first hour was 5p, with 15p for two, 25p for three and a horrendous 35p for four it would surely be only the richest motorist who would stump up the monumental sum of 75p for a whole days parking!

Stories from a year , 1974

Cleaners, cooks and caretakers shook hands with royalty in December 1974 when the Duchess of Kent formally opened the new YMCA building in Gonville Place, erected at a cost of over £400,000 to replace the old building swept away for the Lion Yard redevelopment.

That building was not the first meeting place for the Cambridge branch of the Young Men's Christian Association which had come into being in February 1851, just 7 years after the movement's foundation in London. It existed to cultivate the mental talents of the young men of the town and to give it a religious direction. Thus they sought to provide a library of religious books, a Reading Room with religious periodicals, rooms for classes and social religious meetings as well as lectures on all subjects. But to do this it needed space.

The first rooms in Rose Crescent were too dark and hard to get to, the second in Sidney Street were defective in heating and ventilation, little better than the third home, Hobson Place where the landlord wanted to increase the agreed £30 rent. As they were by then £15 in debt things looked bleak indeed.

But the Association had a Committee which included some of the most notable of Cambridge businessmen and by 1866 when they moved yet again, this time to St Edward's Passage, such was the numbers attending lectures and using the library that much larger premises were needed.

At this time there came onto the market a site in Alexandra Street which was in the centre of town beside the Post Office next the central telegraph station surrounded by roads yet away from the noise of traffic. When other businessmen agreed to act as trustees the future was assured.

When the committee, including Mr Foster the banker Mr Bowes the bookseller, Mr Sayle the shopkeeper, Mr Munsey the Jeweller, planned a building they looked for the best architect of the time, Alfred Waterhouse.

The foundation stone was laid by William Fowler, MP in 1870 and it opened 11 months later, at a cost of £5,000. It included a lecture room that would hold 400 people which became known as the Alexandra Hall, playing an important part in the social life of the town.

It was here that in 1908 a Blackpool company first demonstrated "Animated Pictures" and it was soon in regular use, though only for films of a high moral tone. In 1910 it became one of the first three Cambridge buildings licensed under the Cinematograph Act and was the scene of regular shows.

But by February 1914 the rent was six weeks in arrears and the Committee gave them one week's notice to quit. Two new applicants asked to continue its use for the same purpose, but it was not to be. In December that year the Welsh Division marched into Cambridge and the YMCA was the one place ready to receive such invaders. For the next five years the Alexandra Hall was devoted to meeting the needs of the troops, with recreation rooms, canteen and concerts.

The process was repeated in 1939 but the work extended to the civilians evacuated to Cambridge to escape the London bombing. Nor were the troops manning the lonely searchlight and anti-aircraft stations overlooked with a Tea Car soon employed. Mobile canteens were at the Railway Station to welcome the troops returning from Dunkirk beaches and soon even the Alexandra street premises were full, men overflowing on to the pavement outside and the Tea Car supplementing the canteen. Later American troops and Italian prisoners of war came to know and appreciate the facilities.

Post-war the YMCA developed its community role once more until the needs of big business became paramount and the site was needed for redevelopment. Hence the new building with its community rooms and study, bedrooms mainly let to non University students and business trainees that received its Royal opening in 1974

Stories from a year 1975

Beer drinkers mourned the demolition of the "Bun Shop" on St. Andrews Hill in 1975 but beyond the rebuilding of the Lion Yard area a "Red Cow" was reborn.

Bitter comments have been exchanged over pints about the loss of a favourite drinking haunt. Three of the most famous central public houses were the "Wrestlers Inn", Petty Cury which was demolished 1888, to be followed by the "Falcon Inn" nearby & in 1910 by the "Hoop Hotel", Bridge Street. This latter had been acquired by one Charles Dixon just so he could do away with the licence since he felt it was 'blasting & blighting lives of young men that went to it'.

This was part of a great period of Temperance activity occasioned by proposed changes in the Licensing regulations & in 1911 considerable number of public houses closed. Not content, with this the Cambridge Licencing Reform committee petitioned for closure of more in certain areas of town. Several pubs closed following the Great War. They included the "True Blue" in 1919 & in 1924 the Black Swan" in Guildhall Street was converted to Fisher House.

The 1930's saw the closure of the "Grapes Inn" in Castle Street, the famous "Three Tuns" where it was rumoured Dick Turpin had lodged, the "Bell" in Peas Hill - demolished for the rebuilding of the Guildhall - and "one of the best known hostelries amongst older generations of country folk", the "Carriers Arms" in St Tibbs Row.

But the decade also saw new pubs such as the "Milton Arms" and the "British Queen" on Histon Road opened to cater for the expanding town. In 1959 the "Weathervane" became the first new pub to be built & opened since the War, it was quickly followed by others on the new Arbury estate, "Carlton Arms" & "Snow Cat". The 1960s saw the opening of the "Racehorse", "Queen Edith" & "Plough and Harrow" for more new areas.

In the old areas rebuilding found the "Free Press" standing alone in an area of demolition, one of 239 licenced houses to be found in 1962 whilst the "Man on the Moon", Norfolk St opened, replacing a pub demolished on East Rd.

Losses included "Angel", Market Hill (1962), "Pelican", East Rd (1967), "Criterion", Market Passage (1968) to be followed shortly by the "House of Commons", "Wheatsheaf", Castle Hill & the "Rhadegund", King St. whilst protestors were by now fighting to keep the "Milton Arms" open.

The licenced trade were worried by the decision in 1967 to grant a licence to supermarkets to sell drinks and by the 1978 decision to grant Christ's college a full beer licence for its college bar; previously they had operated under Vice Chancellor's wine licence which felt not to cover beer or spirits. They also felt that wine bars would make city pubs redundant. Yet others mourned the passing of Millers Wine parlour on Kings Parade in 1972 though it reopened as "Shades" in 1974.

Closures continued in the 1970s including the "Britannia", "Old English Gentleman", "Brewers Arms" & "King William IV" on Newmarket Rd but the 'Real Ale' movement became active, organising Beer Festivals and in 1976 reopening the "Salisbury Arms" which had closed three years previously.

More recently the "British Queen" briefly became "Bumpers" - a "fun pub" and the "Racehorse" changed to "Hoofers" with flashing lights and loud music. But nobody will reopen the "Bun Shop"; it remains just a fond memory for many older drinkers and an odd name for the rest.

Stories from a year 1976

Waiting for water was the memory during the 11 month drought of 1976

Hobson's Brook dried up for possibly the first time and in various parts of the country the water tap did little but gurgle and gasp as supplies ran out.

The hardship was temporary but gave an insight into life just a few years ago for in 1945 an official county council report showed that less than half of the rural homes had piped water, the others had to work for every drop of water at the pump. Often this meant a considerable walk, one in five households were over 100 yards away from a pump, and on arrival there might be a queue.

On the other hand the luxury of a pump opposite your front door could also be a handicap as from six o'clock in the morning onwards there was an almost incessant squeaking and rattling as people waited for water. Sometimes the man of the house on his way to work would fill the family water cart and leave it covered for the children to fetch later. Others who could not afford such a luxury would waddle home carrying the heavy pails swinging from the hooks at the ends of chains from broad wooden yokes.

People had their own theories about pumping; some pushed the handle down to its lowest point and leant on it, forcing the water out by a series of short downwards thrusts. Others let it rise to the highest point and then jerked it down to nose level, both hands clasping over the handle.

Whichever way it was a puffing business after a few minutes. It took fourteen full strokes to fill an average size bucket at Lt Eversden, recorded E.M. Barraud, who could judge it to the half inch even in complete darkness. Not that she went to the pump after dark, except in an emergency only amateurs or natives afflicted with town visitors given to endless ablutions went to the pump at night

Cambridge itself had enjoyed the luxury of piped water since the monks laid a pipe in 1325 from the Madingley Road, whilst the Conduit named after Hobson the carrier had begun in 1610. The Victorians had passed an Act of Parliament in 1853 which authorised the establishment of works to supply the inhabitants of the University and Borough of Cambridge with water. Additional supplies were obtained from a pumping station at Fulbourn which opened in 1891 but in 1907 these were found to be contaminated with sewage from the Asylum.

Country folk well knew the difficulties of pure water; in 1889 a newspaper editorial reported one village's water as "covered with a green slimy substance and full of living creatures; to add to its high flavour most of the liquids from the adjoining farmyard closets and pig sties are drained into it".

That year residents of Fen Ditton spent £105.14.7 sinking a new well following several outbreaks of fever. In 1910 the County Medical Officer of Health surveyed the public water supply in several of his villages; Croxton well was polluted and was not worth spending money on, five wells at Willingham were also contaminated but there was no better supply available. In the Swavesey area there had been frequent blockages in the public supply and the County were negotiating with the East Hunts Water Company who had installed large pumps at Bourn in 1892.

Drought in 1859 had dried up virtually all the wells at Linton the greatest scarcity the old men could ever remember whilst in 1921 as temperatures rose to 136 degrees the Littleport water supply gave out and lorries had to be brought in from Ely, men women and children queuing for water at a half penny a bucket.

In view of all that the problems of 1976 and 1983 when water workers strikes once more brought stand pipes into the streets were of little concern. Miss Barraud felt in 1945 that pumping was a sociable business; in just half an hour you could see almost everybody, hear all the news and more than all the scandal, sentiments not echoed by those who learned the hard way that water from the tap can be a luxury.

Stories from a year 1977...

June 1977 was Jubilee month; Cambridgeshire went red, white & blue with people reported as dressing, decorating, drinking, planting, buying selling and even eating anything that stays still long enough to have a Union Jack printed on it. Everything that is except the official Cambridge Jubilee Year souvenir books, even at half price some thousand copies were left. Nor did everybody join in the spirit of Jubilee as the original bill of £500 for street decorations soared to £988 because of the cost of replacing vandalised bunting.

The planning for it all had of course taken some months; Stapleford was not alone in starting its deliberations in October the year before. They like many others were having to contemplate just what sort of events ought to be organised and, again like many others, decided to include Jubilee sports, decorated vehicles and a Street party for the youngsters, with other celebrations for the not so young, who could actually remember the Coronation in 1953 and even the previous Silver Jubilee way back in 1935.

Cambridge itself sought inspiration from even further back, basing its programme of sports on Midsummer Common on the rustic sports that were themselves revived for Queen Victoria's coronation. Supermarket Trolley races had been omitted from that earlier celebration but were included now along with more traditional fireworks, bands and parades

"J" stood, it was said for "Jollity, Joy and Jubilation". Almost inevitably it also stood for "Juveniles", the children's day, to be remembered in years to come as "the day I went to the street party and the sandwiches got soggy and the crisps got soggy"; in fact "all the food was soggy so we did not eat it". The inside story of the Cambridge Jubilee was published by children from Kings Hedges School in the July 1977 issue of their magazine "Rooftops".^ _

Some of the pupils watched the Queen on the telly; there in the golden chariot was the lady "nobody hates, because she is nice to everyone and everything ... she even cares for the insects which is very nice of her".

But there were other things to do besides watching telly. Street parties had been arranged, at Crathern Way 300 people came, but the weather was unkind. "It was raining and we had some nice food and first of all we went to the Magic Man and then we had the food. It was still raining so we went to the community centre to have our food. All of the food was soggy so we did not eat it". But others had no such scruples "I had two jam tarts and four slices of bread and we had two cakes."^ _

Then there was the Carnival: "it was quite fun and was very exciting". "I was a bear in the carnival. I did a dance; it was scary", "and then the dragon came, scaly back, fiery mouth, then the St George came to the rescue, throwing spears and thrusting swords, then the dragon goes and in comes Robin Hood playing games with his Merry men in the woods". "My mask had a nose like a pig. My brother thought I was a pig when I went by him. When I came home I had a meringue cake with a cherry and a cup of tea". "I was a prince on a float. The floats were lorries decorated with flowers and flags... on the float it was very cold. Every time we went round a corner we nearly fell off". I did not like it one bit because it was freezing cold"

But not all children could play all day: "I got up and I did the washing up, the wiping up and putting away. Then I did the dusting, swept the carpet, then I had a wash. After that I had my breakfast". "I took a Jubilee cake up to an old lady for her tea and I pushed an old lady in the procession and we all got a flag and a red, white and blue lolly"

Food and fun meant thirst. For most it was a glass of orange squash, for others "a drink of coke and a drink of punch and I did not get drunk". But for at least one eleven year old "my mum got us some cider to drink and some cakes as well. I got drunk and I was sick so I went to bed. Next day I was a little bit better and I really enjoyed it".

And so did thousands of others throughout the county and throughout the country in celebration of a Jubilee like no other, and yet like all others.

Stories from a year, 1978
CWN 19.12.89

It was near Christmas 1978 that a remarkable cross section of the Cambridge community gathered in the church of St Mary the Less for a funeral service for a well-known Cambridge personality.

There was a former Dean of Jesus College, a police superintendent, booksellers, shopkeepers, a solicitor, market traders, college staff. They heard an address from the Rev James Owen and they sang hymns. Then they exchanged reminiscences about the man whose service they were attending, paid tribute to his memory and went away.

A regular occurrence in a town like Cambridge perhaps. A distinguished academic, or leading businessman had died it might be thought. But that service was not for this sort of personality, but for a man of no fixed address, who had some 113 convictions, mainly on drinking charges, and who was known to the congregation of 50 as the shabby old man with a beard who sat and drank in the city centre.

Some friends of Trevor Hughes, who'd died at the age of 66 after a heart attack, had not wished to see his death go unmarked and unnoticed by a community which had come to notice him, and some even to love him, in all his years in Cambridge. He was, said some, a personality in an age of conformity. He was, said others, an awkward and difficult old drunkard who cursed and swore at those who passed by as he half, lay propped up against the base of the old fountain in the Market Hill.

He was one of the large community who traditionally made their way to the University town as they tramped the country. In the 1800s a network of Casual Ward was set up between 14 and 20 miles apart where the tramps were given supper and a bed and then worked for 2 hours before leaving to continue their journey. At Cambridge it was reported in 1909 that sometimes all provision for tramps at the workhouse was full and in 1927 with vagrancy soaring after the Great War 117 had been accommodated one night in premises suitable for 60 in the Mill Road workhouse. Two years later a new Casual ward was built at Union Lane Chesterton the most up-to-date in the country. It had spring mattresses and showers hot and cold water and an expensive electric fumigator holding 80 blankets at a time. The new facility proved popular and numbers increased to 80 a day; extensions had to be added in order to cope. But after a decade it was accepted that the casuals were merely using the wards as a hotel. Numbers had doubled and many strong and healthy men refused the work that was readily available at the time and the Government closed down the wards. With the closure of the workhouse the problem of the homeless did not go away. The Salvation Army White Ribbon Hostel and the Church Army dormitories in Willow Walk were supplemented in 1968 when the Simon Community opened a former pub in East Road as a shelter for misfit dossers and alcoholics where they could live without being institutionalised. But they soon found that the policy of mixing drinkers and non-drinkers was not working and that public hostility was growing. Today in Lion Yard shoppers loaded with Christmas spirits are accosted as they make their way back to their cars whilst young carol singers collecting money for charity see first hand some of the problems they are attempting to alleviate.

Meanwhile the old Mill Road workhouse - where Christmas day had always been made one for its inmates to remember is now starting its new role as a caring home for the elderly sheltered between its walls from the cold of an outdoor night and the discomfort of a Market Hill

February was the traditional month for student eccentricity to be given free rein. Thus when Saturday shoppers on the first day of Rag Week saw the damp grass of Parker's Piece covered with prayer mats, heard kneeling students reciting from the Koran as they faced towards Mecca, and watched their procession through the streets they well might wonder whether this was just another money raising stunt.

But this was for real a political demonstration by Iranian students calling for a blessing on the efforts of the Ayatollah Khomeini to overthrow what they described as an "unjust, irresponsible, inhuman and cruel regime" of the Shah of Persia.

It had been 11.30 on the 28th June 1873 when news of the Shah of Persia's imminent arrival was received at Cambridge Guildhall.

Immediately the civic machine swung into action. The town council was hastily convened and the Bull Hotel told to lay on suitable refreshments. Soup and meat, fish and fowl, heaps of patisserie, geles and crèmes, soufflés and cakes were quickly produced.

Horses and vehicles were ordered, including an open carriage drawn by two of the best greys with postillion outriders. Shops shut and bunting appeared from nowhere. Buglers summoned members of the Rifle Volunteers to provide a guard of honour.

The University Vice Chancellor had been informed and immediately he too had acted gathering together such of his distinguished colleagues as were available on that June day. College silver was brought out of store lest the Shah need more refreshment than the Bull could provide.

In just one and a half hours all was ready. The Mayor and Corporation journeyed to the station past windows already packed with people waiting to glimpse such a distinguished entourage. There together with University, the military band and an expectant crowd of 1,500 people they awaited the arrival of the 1.10 special from Crewe.

It was all something of a shock to the Stationmaster who had not been appraised of the visit. Had he known the platform would have been spruced up and he would have worn his best suit. Slowly everybody became aware that something was wrong. The Shah had arrived at Dover some weeks earlier and was staying at Buckingham Palace where a special telegraph line had been placed at his disposal so he could have direct communication with his wives in Teheran. Perhaps there was a crisis at home in the desert.

Then they realised the telegraph had appeared on the hallmaster's table at the Guildhall: it had not come over the wires: it was all a hoax and even the Mayor joined in the general laughter at the clever ruse that had drawn so many dignitaries to the station on a fools errand.

The visit that never was passed into folklore.

Then in March 1965 the rumour started again only this time he was supposed to be arriving by a Heron of the Queen's flight at Marshall's airport. Quite what his itinerary was nobody really knew - perhaps a stroll along the Backs, a visit to King's and Trinity, and then round off the stay with a pint of beer and game of darts at the Queen's Head, Newton. Some believed it and a crowd of a hundred waited outside King's chapel. Others did not including the Sunday lunchtime regulars in the village pub. But this time it was as real as the thirty pound boost to the pile of pennies being collected to improve the Village hall testify

In February 1980 headlines proclaimed that a fight was on to save St Clements church, Parishioners were forming an action group to try and stop the church being made redundant.

Their action followed a Diocesan report which recommended merger with other churches as a way of coping with the changing pattern of life in central Cambridge. As the town expanded new churches had been constructed to serve the new communities - St Barnabas, St Philip and in New Cherry Hinton a meeting was held in 1891 which led to the consecration of the nave and chancel of St John's church, although it was to be 1929 before it was completed. St George's off Milton Road was consecrated in 1938 and as post-war housing development increased with it came more churches. Sometimes the plans did not work out. A new church district was created from the parishes of St Andrew the Less and Fen Ditton in 1947 only to be dissolved in 1956, although the name St Stephens was used for the church dedicated in 1962, one of five announced by the Bishop of Ely in 1955. One of these was the Nicholas Ferrar Memorial Church on the Arbury Estate whose foundation stone was laid by Princess Margaret in 1957, and she returned in 1976 to attend a service to celebrate its completion.

However the growth of population which meant new churches were needed was matched by declining congregations elsewhere. In 1958 a Diocesan report recommended that six churches should be declared redundant, including St Michael, St Botolph and St Clement. St Michael's was reconstructed and opened in its new form in 1966. St Peter's which closed 1971 and All Saints amalgamated with Holy Sepulchre in 1973 were both taken over by the Redundant Churches Fund.

But others launched spirited resistance. The parishioners of St. Andrew the Great opposed the proposals, shared their building with the Greek Orthodox Church but finally closed in 1984, although the future of the church building is still subject of debate. The ousted Greek congregation turned to St Clement's who like other congregations were also faced with the expense of maintaining the fabric of the church. It had been erected around 1200 to replace an original wooden building but by 1567 the original west tower was ruinous and taken down. The present tower was paid for from the estate of the antiquarian William Cole who appointed James Essex, one of his executors to do the work. But Essex died soon after Cole and it was not until 1821 that it was built, and then in the wrong place - Cole had wanted it to be erected over the graves of his sisters and not on the street. The new tower was topped by a steeple but by 1928 this was in a dangerous condition and was removed, An appeal for £120,000 was launched in 1984 although one correspondent considered that the building should be left to fall into decay and that as a ruin it would perform a valuable public amenity - far better as a wilderness garden than as one of the least attractive Cambridge ecclesiastical buildings.

But many others disagreed and so the religious community continues with their own style of traditional worship following the, rituals of the Holy Catholic & Apostolic Church of England with its incense and bells, embroidered surplices and servers with candles in a building that in one form or another has served for over 800 years.

In March 1981 a new name emerged for an old problem with the announcement that the shopping development centred on the Fitzroy Street area of Cambridge was to be called The Grafton Centre.

It was named after Augustus Henry Fitzroy, the third Duke of Grafton. The Duke had been educated at Peterhouse and became Chancellor of the University in 1768. He had died in 1811 and his name had already been taken for the street that was at that time starting to grow in the open fields of Barnwell that had been inclosed in 1811. Then the straggling buildings in Blucher Row had become Fitzroy Street. Adjacent to it were two streets commemorating a famous carrier and mayor who had a large house on Newmarket Road, James Burleigh.

The area that grew around these streets formed a compact little township separated from the historic centre by a ring of grass – Christ's Pieces and New Square - the latter elegantly laid out with houses between 1825 and 1854. Separated physically from the University centre with its shops serving University needs the local residents found their local needs met in the locality with small-scale shops offering cheaper goods.

Some pointed out that Fitzroy Street was the hardest street in the town to get to - there were Gates at either end and a Cart(w)right in the middle - a punning allusion to the names of shop owners. There was also the Moon and the Starr (more shop names) and when asked about the Sun to complete the heavenly trio young Percy Moon would say - I'm the son - my dad keeps the shop.

Writing in 1976 the late Percy North remembered people like Elijah Tarrant whose delicious ice cream was very popular during Midsummer Fair, Whiteheads the fruiter, Jim Stokes the bakers and a tall building built as a jam factory for Sturton the grocer. One general store was kept by Mr. Austin who could be seen daily taking small quantities of coal on a sack barrow to his many customers - few people could afford to buy a hundredweight at a time although the price was only 1/-. There was a clothes shop owned by Whiteleys where payment could be made "a tanner a week" and a small shop where coffee was sold at half-penny a cup, making it a welcome meeting place for many of the unemployed.

The area was never rich and in winter the former Shakespeare Brewery was opened as a soup kitchen supplying a basin of soup and slice of bread for a penny to the out-of-work with tickets available from grocers for others at twice the price.

There were various other welfare groups including a Home of Mercy "for girls who had taken the wrong path" who were employed at laundry work and attended services at Christ Church where there were special pews for them - and a special gateway from the home into the churchyard so there was no need to go through the street.

But into the area of small scale shopping came enterprising businessmen, one of whom was William Heffer who opened in Fitzroy Street in July 1872 as a stationer and newsagent. Soon he began adding books, mainly for Sunday and day school prizes, expanding into adjacent premises and opened a sub post-office. But in the 1890s to attract custom from the "other" Cambridge he hit on the idea of offering dons and undergraduates a discount of 25% on their cash purchase of books - matching a similar offer from London publishers. Other Cambridge booksellers were vehement in their opposition and tried to cut off Heffer's supplies from the publishers. In this they failed and had to allow the same discounts to their own customers. But now all shops were competing equally Heffer no longer had the means of enticing buyers into the long walk to his shop. His move from Fitzroy Street into Petty Cury to be nearer the established shopping area was an early indication that the attractions of the Fitzroy Street area were not enough in themselves to secure a viable business

Midwife to the atomic monster

THE news of an explosion of the first Atom bomb at Hiroshima made headlines around the world in August, 1945.

As first stories of the effect of that bomb came through so Cambridge scientists celebrated the research that had made it possible. The routine research conducted at the Cavendish Laboratory had been led by men who had worked with the late Lord Rutherford whose work on radioactivity had led to the discovery of the nucleus the minute body at the centre of the atom in which enormous energy is imprisoned.

The work of these scientists was one of the great secrets of the war and the men engaged in it pledged to complete and absolute secrecy. Only after the bomb had exploded could it be made known that four members of the Technical Committee had close associations with Cambridge, as had the man who directed the work on the atom bomb. Prof Oppenheimer. As the second bomb devastated Nagasaki and some of the details of destruction became known so local people waited for Japanese capitulation and peace — but also wondered whether Cambridge had been midwife to a monster that might destroy all mankind.

Debate over the role of Cambridge in conflict was nothing new. During the Great War the University's scientific departments were engaged in research with the Cavendish investigating methods of signalling to and from the trenches and working ways of detecting submarines and the Chemical Laboratories developing the new poison gases and inventing the gas mask.

In 1937 other Cambridge scientists constructed the Government's recommended "gas proof rooms" in college buildings and semi-detached houses and analysed the effectiveness of the gas masks that had been produced, voicing particular concern about their use with very young children.

In 1951 as Civil Defence authorities laid their plans to protect Cambridge from the result of a nuclear attack the presence of American bases was causing grave concern. Seven years later it came very close to home with the establishment of a Thor missile base at Mepal in 1957 leading to protest marches.

In the event that base survived the Cuba crisis of 1962 by only a year but CND "Spies for Peace" directed public attention to other, more secret, evidence of preparation for nuclear war.

The peace movement was given additional boost with the announcement in 1980 that Cruise missiles would be based at Molesworth and by January 1st 1982 a peace camp had been established there.

Meanwhile city and county authorities were engaged in their own nuclear dispute. While one issued leaflets stating that there would be no defence against nuclear weapons the others held exercises on how they would cope with any emergency, civil or military. Once more the scientist entered the public arena with claims that in the event of a nuclear exchange nearly 500,000 people would die with Cambridge suffering 97 per cent casualties.

Whatever the rights and wrongs, facts and figures, a grim reminder of the reality of war was received in the city in November, 1982. This was when the Mayor was presented with a fragment of roof tile dug up by the children from that first Japanese city to be devastated by the weapon that was born in Cambridge

In 1983 a building in a backwater sold for over £1,000,000 and County Hall passed into history.

It was in Hobson Street that in 1914 the fledgling County Council had opened its first purpose built headquarters. It had not been their first choice but the Town Council had refused to let them back into the buildings facing Market Hill which once had served as the site for both county and borough administration, the Guildhall being tucked away behind the older Shire House. When in 1842 new Assize Courts had opened on Castle Hill the Town Council expanded into the now vacant front building, glad of the extra space. But then in 1888 a massive reorganisation of local government established County Councils giving them new powers and responsibilities.

The new administration found Castle Hill too far out of the town, somewhere else was needed for council meetings and office staff. The officials were installed in rooms scattered throughout the town centre and formal Council Meetings were held in the Guildhall. For a while peace prevailed. Soon however the two councils found themselves at loggerheads; Cambridge wanted to expand its area, to take in Chesterton and parts of Coton, Trumpington, Cherry Hinton and Fen Ditton; the County objected. As violent debates echoed around the Council chamber so the relations between the two hit rock bottom. This was no time for a joint building operation though both desperately needed new offices. So in 1912 the old Hobson Street Methodist Chapel was bought as the site for the new County Hall; it opened two years later to the chagrin of the Town whose own plans for Guildhall rebuilding had been blocked by Ratepayers from the newly assimilated Chesterton area.

Now new battles erupted for expanded Cambridge felt itself large enough to be allowed to run all its own affairs and not have to pay rates to the upstart County Council. Once more they won the debate though this time their plans were defeated by tactical voting in Parliament in 1914. By 1928 the County Council were finding themselves once more strapped for space. Eyes turned to Castle Hill where the old Gaol, whose last prisoners had moved out in 1916, was being used as a store for the Public Record Office. Thousands flocked to visit the Condemned Cell in 1930 before demolition started, the bricks being reused for the new Shire Hall that opened on the site in 1932.

The Town Council were furious yet new offices for the County whilst they were stuck in their old building. This time they would rebuild but where? A report which recommended abandoning the central area for a site on Parkside was finally rejected. The inevitable opposition that once more erupted was dismissed. Buildings on Peas Hill were pulled down and new offices put up, then the old Shire House was demolished and the present Guildhall erected. The join between the two stages can be seen to this day.

On Castle Hill the old Assize Courts finally vanished in 1953 but plans for additional offices on the site were defeated. Instead a new storey was added on the existing Shire Hall and as paperwork increased both county and city bought or built new accommodation for their expanding workforce. Meanwhile in Hobson Street other councils and officials were continuing to provide valuable services to their communities without attracting headlines. When the sale of County Hall was announced few remembered the building, let alone the battles that had been fought from there in the early years of the County Council.

In 1984 a little boy called Ben hit the headlines. Two years old he was already living on borrowed time and would certainly die without a liver transplant. Nobody had performed such surgery on a child so young but it could be done - provided a donor liver could be found.

In desperation the mother picked up the telephone and called "That's Life" and within hours help - in the form of a television film crew - was on its way. What happened next was recounted in the BBC book "Ben; the story of Ben Hardwick" which was published in 1985. It tells how next morning the programme office was as chaotic as usual with plans for the following show. A balloon manufacturer was offering a giant inflatable vicar to fly over a church, a con man they had been tracking for six months had been arrested and there was the next round of street interviews to arrange. Programme presenter Esther Rantzen was concerned about the Ben story; "How does Ben look" she asked, "Gorgeous" was the reply. As the resulting book records; "That is the main hurdle crossed. If Ben looks appealing, the point of the story will come home with even more impact".

Stories of illness and its cure have always had an appeal beyond the merely medical. When Elizabeth Woodcock of Impington was discovered having survived her eight days being buried in the snow in 1799 the same issue of the newspaper contained an advertisement for a portrait of the poor lady and for the book which her doctor was intending to publish on the subject. In 1855 the gentry and clergy in the vicinity of Stapleford had flocked to the home of Sarah Carter, dubbed the "Sleeping Beauty", who had been confined to her bed for thirty years and once slept for seventeen weeks. Her mother "has been frequently offered large sums of money by strangers for a personal view of the deceased; but this her mother refused".

Those who could cure were people to be venerated. One such was Dr. Brodnum who visited Cambridge in 1790 and produced testimonials to his powers, William Royston, shoemaker of Green Street, had been afflicted with scurvy and unable to sit on a chair, the son of Mr. Cheeswright, a Littleport shopkeeper had been in a decline for some time. Mr. Clark of Wilburton had lost the use of both his legs entirely - all had been cured by the great man as each would testify. Others claimed to make the deaf hear and the blind see.

Meanwhile legitimate medical men were investigating new techniques. A convicted murderer was cut down from the gallows at Cambridge castle and taken to the University chemical lecture rooms where he was subjected to electrical shocks to try and test such treatments could simulate breathing. A detailed report appeared in the Cambridge Chronicle for August 13th 1819 which went on to record how hundreds of spectators had taken advantage of the opportunity to view the body in the room in which the experiments had taken place.

Generally however developments were taking place away from the public gaze. But the resulting triumphs were heralded - hole in the heart operations, the first kidney graft and liver transplants. But new developments encountered new problems and those faced with the choice between high-tech, high-cost medicine and the needs of the very young or very old had unenviable decisions to make. Public funding for a body scanner at Addenbrooke's in 1981 showed what could be achieved with the support of the public.

But no money could buy a kid a liver, perhaps a television appeal could show that a lost young life could allow another young life to continue. And so it proved, within weeks a donor had been found. Millions followed Ben's progress. Then, when the story seemed to have passed its peak a member of the TV team glimpsed the headlines on a Cambridge Evening Newsvendors board. "Liver baby Ben dies". Away from television lights a life had faded away but the hope it represented would live on.

"Katrina and the Waves" made musical history in 1985 by becoming the first Cambridge based pop group to achieve a Top-10 hit with their single "Walking on Sunshine". That year also saw the first Cambridge Rock competition, as the town came to grips with the music its youngsters wanted to hear. It followed years when the fear of excessive noise had outweighed Councilor's appreciation of the sound with concerts in the Corn Exchange and on Midsummer Common called off for fear of excessive decibels.

However the complaint of the new fangled music is not only a problem of the 1980s. In 1908 people were complaining that "the gramophone nuisance of a fine evening is quite appalling", although by 1914 there was considerable demand for records of the latest dance fad - the Tango. The 1920s saw a series of concerts organised by Millers Music shop, the thirties a number of bands, including Stirlingaires - formed by employees of Marshall's and Shorts - and Percy Cowell who opened the great new entertainment venue, the Dorothy cafe in 1931, to be succeeded by Reg Cottage in 1949.

Dancing at the Dorothy became a popular pastime, though the Rex Ballroom was another popular venue, organising a jitterbug competition during the dark days of 1943, Guildhall dances were sedate affairs until the coming of the new Rock 'n' Roll music when jiving was banned in 1956 after complaints that youngsters were even jiving to waltzes. Ever quick to respond the Rex Ballroom announced it would allow rock and roll sessions and the Kinema showed the film magistrates had wanted banned - "Rock around the clock", going on next year, 1958, to install a juke box.

Then came the great period of pop music in Cambridge as the travelling groups made the Regal cinema one of their bases, Cliff Richard in 1959 attracted vast crowds who blocked Regent Street. He returned next year as did Adam Faith attracting this review from the newspaper correspondent ; "the show was deplorably uninteresting, but the audience gave a magnificent performance" - referring to the crowds of screaming teenagers sparsely mixed with incredulous and slightly-dazed parents. Not content just to listen a group of students organised a 25 hour Jive session, aiming for a world record for non-stop dancing. In 1961 the groups were back. The appearance of the Ted Heath dance band at the Dorothy could not compete in media attention with the drama as Billy Fury was forced to cut short his concert owing to a throat infection and collapsed next day, being rushed to Addenbrooke's hospital for treatment. It did not prevent his return the following year along with Cliff, Adam and Phil Everley.

Then in 1963 came a "four man rock group with weird hairstyles as a gimmick who sang and played their current hits 'Love me Do' and 'Please Please Me'. Although accompanied by Chris Montez, Tommy Roe, Debbie Lee and the Viscounts the show was "not the best Cambridge audiences had seen", but for many of the fans who queued to see the Beatles it was a -night to remember. They returned in November under a police escort, smuggled in a Black Maria into the Downing Site laboratories. The queue for the Regal cinema venue started at 10.30. the Red Cross had dozens of men waiting for fainting and hysterical fans as 4,000 packed to see their idols, though any sounds they made were drowned by the screams of the audience. By comparison the Rolling Stones or P.J. Proby (whose show in 1965 was dropped because of his smutty act) were small beer.

Now with the Junction, a new centre for pop music, perhaps the great days might return. Though one will probably never see such block-busting touring shows as those of the mid 1960s when there were so many stars appearing one night that many had to change in the University Arms Hotel and run across the road to the stage.

American planes above Cambridgeshire countryside can convey mixed emotions.

In 1945 the sound of the Flying Fortresses were as much a part of the Cambridge war effort as the pilots and crew who made the town their centre for rest and recuperation between flights from the bases in the surrounding countryside.

The "National Geographic Magazine" of September 1936 had conveyed to its American readership something of the atmosphere of Cambridge where dons lectured in academic dress, Newnham undergradettes played cricket with long skirts reaching below the tops of their pads and fit young men having breakfasted on rare steak attempted to bump each other in boats on the river.

The colour photographs revealed ancient courts where students lived in former Convent buildings and the "smooth Cam's silent waters reflect a golden willow tree before palace-like Clare College". That river ran beside prosaic Jesus lock "dressed up with a gay flower bed" whilst a "barefoot girl punts picnickers up the Cam to bathing places near Grantchester" whose picturesque beauty had been preserved by their countrymen: "When it was proposed to build an express highway across the pastoral meadows between Cambridge and Grantchester a few years ago, an American Trust Fund purchased the construction rights and thus preserved the rural retreat".

Such a place was worth fighting for and five years later other American visitors were discovering Cambridge for themselves. Local people were urged to help make them feel at home: they were here for the duration of the war, with no chance of home leave, some of them were shy. Residents were urged to invite them home for tea but not to invite the whole street in to view the Americans.

In 1942 the University instituted a professorship in American History, intended to explain the USA to undergraduates. Frank Dobie of the University of Texas at Austin, took up the appointment. His first impression of Emmanuel College of John Harvard was distinctly chilly, even in September rooms were cold and coal scarce. But soon the warmth of his welcome made up for that.

He presented his passport to the police station and received his identity card. He obtained food coupons and surrendered them to the college buttery. In return he would get an ounce of butter, an ounce of olemargarine, and a small amount of sugar which would be placed by his breakfast place each morning along with his monthly ration of a pint of jam or marmalade. More formality attended other meals with diners in gowns, Latin grace and waiter service to be followed in the Combination room with port wine, coffee and only then tobacco.

His experiences were recorded in the April 1946 edition of the "National Geographic" but by then other Americans had themselves gained first hand experience of Cambridge life through the courses organised for them at "Bull College" the Bull Hotel, base of the American Red Cross, whilst they waited repatriation.

Many more have followed in their footsteps through Summer Schools organised by the University Extra Mural Board combining a study vacation with the opportunity to become part of the Cambridge academic community, living and dining in college unlike the large numbers of independent travellers for whom the city is a brief pause on their itinerary.

But the threat of war interrupted the American migration in 1986 after American jets from local bases had made their raids on Libya. Thoughts on how to restrict numbers from causing chaos turned to how to mitigate the financial disaster caused by their absence. Hotels reported mass cancellations and British tourist authorities mounted a publicity campaign to win back the faint hearted Americans.

Part of that package was an expenses paid trip for travel writers who would be shown the sights that had entranced early scribes, although perhaps "Main Street" in Trumpington might no longer have quite the impact it had fifty years before when green gas lamps were still in use, and "cottages with thickly thatched dormer windows suggest prim old ladies in poke bonnets". Nevertheless it worked.

Next year the headlines were once more of fears of saturation and restriction and the impact of American jets this time landing thousands more visitors at nearby Stansted airport

Mike Petty Stories from a year- 1987

In March 1987 they admitted what had always been known that cycles dominate Cambridge traffic when the street narrowing in the central area that had started the previous August was confirmed. With no room for motor vehicles to overtake bicycles would regulate the speed of progress.

But the speed of cycles themselves were once the source of concern as a correspondent in 1904 recorded. "A few years ago the bicycle was looked upon by pedestrians as a real terror and accidents were frequent. Those that grew up with the machine now simply regard it as one of the ordinary dangers but still watch out for the "wheeler" who comes scorching by at the phenomenal speed of 20mph".

By then Cambridge should have been used to the things there was a record that as early as 1847 somebody in Cambridge had a giant tricycle with a 12 foot wheelbase whilst one man claimed to have ridden the first bike in the town in 1863. Robert Taylor of Soham was said to be one of the pioneers of the machine. When about 18years old he had built a tricycle that could be propelled by the rider. Later he came upon a woodcut published in the "Illustrated London News" which depicted a man riding on two wheels. Local folk laughed at the idea but the young man persisted. He made two very light wheels of wood with wooden spokes and an iron rim. Pieces of old iron were fashioned into the main frame the front fork alone weighing ten pounds. It was complete in 1868 and two years later he rode it to London where, it was said, it created a sensation. John Howes also claimed to have built a boneshaker in 1868 after seeing one in the Paris Exhibition before going on to build their own "Granta" cycles.

In 1931 W.J. Taylor wrote of an early machine that he had hired from Messrs Dean Bros of East Road at the rate of 1d an hour in the early 1870s. He went on to recall a road race from Oxford to Cambridge in 1877 which caused immense excitement and led to the formation of the Bicycle Union which assisted in the drafting of the Highways Amendment Act of 1879 with byelaws relating to bicyclists.

Various rules were made to govern the machines. In 1904 they were allowed to ride on various paths over the commons, by 1908 the council were considering banning them from Senate House Passage but when the first one way restrictions were introduced in Market Street and Petty Cury in 1925 there was one category of traffic that could go against the flow as they have done legally or illegally ever since

Cyclists complained of motorists and were seeking their own cycleways in 1913

As pneumatic tyres were developed so they suffered other problems in 1906 one particular cat was reported to be adept at puncturing them as people biked past and in 1910 the flints put on the road to provide footholds for horses during snow were also complained of for similar reasons

Machines were expensive a second-hand machine sold for 35/- (1.75) in 1910 and various firms aped Dean's idea of hiring them out. One such was Herbert Robinson who by 1911 were doing good business hiring to undergraduates, and demonstrated good business sense or good luck when in 1938 they took delivery of 500 machines just before a bus strike.

Bicycle thieves were soon on the scene with a professional gang being detected shipping stolen bikes to London by train in 1910 and having a drastic effect on employment since even then it was claimed that house prices were so high that ordinary folk had to live far from the centre and needed the machines to get to work. Although necessary they were also a nuisance. "Pavements are full of parked machines whilst college courts are empty" .A quote not from the editorials of March 1990 but from the Cambridge Daily News of 5th March 1910! It went on to say "it will be 20 or 30 years before the problem is solved" perhaps a trifle optimistic

Itinerant traders and musicians are part of the Cambridge scene that receives mixed reaction. Shopkeepers with high overheads express annoyance when street vendors set up a Pitch outside, their premises selling, a similar commodity. In 1973 ice cream sellers were being criticised for extortionate prices – 4 single ices cost 50p. from one stall whereas a super-large cone on Newmarket racecourse was 15p. compared to 9p in central Cambridge. The prices were considered outrageous, since the introduction of zero-rated VAT meant that prices should have gone with a choc bar now down to 5p.

The noise of the vendors prompted complaints in 1911 when hot-cross sellers were crying their wares at 5.30 a.m. though this nuisance had abated by 1915. The call "Hot-cross buns, one a penny, two a penny, hot cross buns" was no longer applicable since price rises had meant there were no halfpenny buns to be had. The vendors, would, said one correspondent, go the same way as the muffin man – and few would mourn their parting. Nighttimes could be disturb by the "trotter man" selling his wares well into the dark and the sound of the newspaper vendor's cry is said to have even found its way into Kings College chapel and been echoed on the organ by Charles Stanford.

Some traders were "characters" who attracted public support. The death in 1910 of George Randell a blind man who lived on Honey Hill and sold matches at street corners was remarked upon - not least because he was so tall that his coffin had to be made seven feet long.

But it is perhaps the street musician who provokes the most mixed reaction with complaints of a constant procession of them in Mill Road in 1922. Part of the architects brief for the Lion Yard redevelopment was that it should become a place of entertainment for shoppers and, since its opening, it has attracted a wide range of buskers. Many are of the screech and yell variety with little or no talent whose only ability is to discourage window shopping and encourage a turnover of shop assistants whose life is made miserable by their limited and oft repeated repertoire. Occasionally however crowds of shoppers will stop in their tracks to applaud the talents of the musicians performing.

Two Cambridge lads made a reputation for themselves by playing classical music in the streets in 1949 and the formula was repeated in 1975 by Dag Ingram and Michael Copley, students at Churchill college who within a year were attracting crowds of 200 to their performances in Petty Cury whilst even more were soon queuing to watch them in concert halls around the world. Their success was anticipated by Gerry Bol, a one man band who himself has featured on television, both for his musicianship and for his arrest in 1978 on charges of obstruction during a crackdown on itinerant traders.

The Council's concern for the cleanliness of foodsellers stalls, for the smell and litter that may be generated, and for the increasing numbers of vendors led to constant debate and correspondence culminating in the licensing of a number of pitches which came into force in March 1988. Two months later -there was a new face on the music scene as Jeremy Sams replaced Dag Ingram in the duo which started its career on the streets of central Cambridge and spread the reputation of Cambridge Busking worldwide.

Stories of a Year 1989

In March 1989 central Cambridge is undergoing great change.

There is demolition and rebuilding on Market Hill, involving the loss of a central cinema. There are plans for a new central superstore and a revamped Market. The incessant debate on parking continues and there are suggestions to redevelop at Parkside.

Can there have ever been a period like it? The answer is simply yes March 1930.

There was said the paper, "the usual rebuilding activity in the centre of town". It centred on precisely the same site as today, with work in progress on building the Victoria Cinema that has been recently demolished. New vistas of Holy Trinity church were being opened, not least from Petty Cury where much of the north side was being knocked down to make way for a new superstore Boots.

That development continued in Sidney Street and soon shoppers would be looking across the road to more building as that side was itself redeveloped for Woolworths and, shortly, Marks and Spencer. Even the traditional Market was the subject of debate. Then, as now, there were plans to revamp it. Plans were canvassed to move the stalls into the Corn Exchange and so release more space for parking in the town centre.

Whilst motorists were still getting used to the changes wrought by the creation of the New Square car park other plans were already being debated that would severely curtail central traffic in July it was to be announced that six colleges were to ban undergraduate cars and motorbikes.

Then, as now, Councillors were casting their eyes towards Parkside seeing it as a suitable site for redevelopment traffic considerations making it seem the best place to put the new Guildhall because of congestion in the centre.

But that was all in 1930. It was the start of a decade of change that left residents bemoaning the loss of old Cambridge as the townscape disappeared before their eyes. It ended with war a war whose headlines once more fill the pages of the Cambridge papers.

1984 05 19 Sardinia answers our road problems - Michael Petty, May 1984

CAGLIARI, capital of Sardinia, has an answer to Cambridge's traffic problems; the roads have a bus and taxi lane which is used by pedestrians, the cars park on the pavements, completely blocking them.

Cars are everywhere, in vast dumps of scrap vehicles which dominate the approaches from the airport, in narrow streets just wide enough to drive down — provided there are no pedestrians.

The central port area is a bustle of lorries and liners bound for Palermo and Naples. Through it had come most of the exhibits for an immense trade fair where electronic gadgets and heavy machinery mingled with Hong Kong plastic toys and Sardinian leather united by music from the large fairground attached.

One could wander for hours, revelling in the atmosphere and bustle, but it is only a temporary attraction and without it the town must assume an atmosphere similar to Ely on a wet Tuesday afternoon.

The Via Roma fronts the docks and is a palm-lined arcaded street with pavement cafes and tourist shops. Behind it a wide street stretches uphill towards the old town whose skyline is far more African than European.

Suddenly one is in an area of narrow lanes and poverty; the guidebooks claim that beyond the shuttered windows there is comparative luxury, I saw only peeling walls, lines of washing and people — widows dressed completely in black and children playing in the streets.

Piazzas afford panoramic views over rooftops, then back again into sunless alleyways, through gates guarded by portcullis erected in 1307 as part of a defence against the invaders who have periodically ravaged the country.

Then another square, this one absolutely and completely packed with people processing to the cathedral where today their minister was making a much-awaited return following illness; invisible today the beautiful interior with its carvings and colour, instead flash-bulbs explode from the pulpits as the packed congregation applaud their pastor.

Elsewhere more noise — of car horns blaring in celebration of a wedding, or an invisible brass band playing a selection of Beatles music from somewhere below the magnificent San Remy Bastion, a magical place for a Sunday afternoon in spring.

In the interior, past the flat lands which surround Cagliari and up into the fringe of the mountains, life is much different; donkeys are more common than cars or tourist coaches and old men watch the world go by from the shadier sides of their village square.

The Giara de Gesturi is a high plateau yet somewhat reminiscent of Wicken Fen, marshy in places, covered with scrub and the home of a rare breed of wild horses and wild boar. The area is dotted with Nuragic remains, fortified houses built some 2,000 years ago, and later we visit the site of an excavation high on a hill-top above Villanovaforru to see the painstaking piecing together of literally every scrap of pottery found there, and most impressive of all a magnificent archaeological museum in the centre of a village probably no bigger than Teversham.

1984 06 30 History Revisited – Horseheath witch, June 1984

Rodney Tibbs is on holiday this week, so we asked librarian MIKE PETTY to dip into the Cambridgeshire Collection. He came up with this story of 20th century witchcraft at Horseheath, near Haverhill

The story of Horseheath's potent 20th century witch

THERE is a spot on the road which leads from Horseheath to Horseheath Green which, even after heavy rain, is almost instantly dry. Horseheath people know the reason why — that is the spot where "Daddy Witch" is buried.

An ancient bony creature half-clothed in rags, she lived in a hut in Garret's Close and, when she died, was buried in the middle of the road opposite the sheep-pond. It is the heat from her body that keeps the road dry.

Daddy Witch was no medieval monster — she lived in the nineteenth century. She was the earliest witch the village people could remember in 1915.

This was when a Horseheath woman, Catherine Parsons, sat down to record notes on the village's witches in 1915 — less than 70 years ago. In a talk she gave to the Cambridge Antiquarian Society, she spoke on witchcraft that existed in the village at that time.

"In this village we have ghosts as real as ever they were, superstition is rife, the wise woman is fresh in our memory, we have our folklore, interesting customs and cures for almost every ill," she told them.

"The parishioners tell you here always were witches and here always will be — the difference between a witch and an ordinary woman is that if the latter wishes you misfortune her wish has no effect but the witch is in league with the devil — she has the power to do evil."

Superstitious people ascribed various powers to the wise woman and generally went out of their way to stay in her good books. When one lady admired some turnips growing in his field, a farmer sent her several of the best; girls in service who returned to Horseheath for their holidays often left the witch a few pence before leaving — but you could also be bewitched by accepting a gift from her.

Once an old lady sent some fine currants that she had grown in her garden to a Horseheath girl staying in London but the girl did not eat them, fearing she might be bewitched. People believed they were safe provided the witch did not possess anything belonging to them — but could you be sure she had not picked up a piece of your broken crockery or taken a sprig from your garden hedge? That would be enough to give her power.

Witches were extortioners and their craft remunerative. Whenever anything went wrong on Church Farm the tenant would send the witch five shillings, believing her to be up to her tricks. A poor woman whose bread would not rise likewise paid for its release. A witch could cast a spell on our coal so that it would not burn and of course she could influence animals. Horses would stop dead in their tracks and only move after she had spoken to them. Pigs would go off their feed. She could send swarms of fleas to pester you and prevent cows giving milk.

But you could fight back — it was believed that there was a very close link between the witch and the thing bewitched. A farmer who beat his cow on the head when it mysteriously stopped producing milk was implored by his man not to hit her any more because he believed the witch would feel the blows and send other troubles. "So if I get a gun and shoot the cow I shall kill the witch an' all," he said.

To protect themselves against witchcraft, Horseheath folk in 1915 believed there was any easy way: "You just go to the village shop and buy a ha'penny worth of salt without saying 'please for it; or you can put a piece of steel under your door mat — for a witch cannot cross steel. Putting a knife under the chair will stop the witch from sitting down if she does come to your house.

"Mother had a brood of young and they were bewitched and covered with vermin. They just lay on their backs, kicked up their little feet and were dying fast — she sent to the shop for an ounce of new pins and stuck them in one of the dead ducks; then she made a good fire and at midnight without telling anybody what she was going to do, she put the ducks right into the middle of the fire and afore the duck had been burning 10 minutes, the witch came screaming to her door, making the most terrible noises for the pain caused by the pins in the burning duck had entered the witch — in the morning the rest of the ducks were cured.

"You can get a pint and a half glass bottle, half fill it with water, put in a lock of hair from the noddle of your neck, also an ounce of new pins, heads downwards, some rusty nails from an old shoe and some parings of your finger and toe nails. Then cork the bottle and put it on the fire at midnight when you're quite alone and boil it until that bursts — but you must not speak whatever happens. The witch will come outside screaming and ranting — and sometimes you just can't keep quiet; soon as you make a sound before the bottle bursts that ain't no good," said Catherine Parsons.

To make a contract with a witch the devil usually appeared to the person in the shape of an animal such as a rat, mouse or toad — "Perhaps this is why if either a toad or newt is found in a house at Horseheath, the creature must at once be put upon the fire, or the inmates of the house will have bad luck."

Once recruited, the witch became possessed of imps or spirits which live upon her body and assist her — unless they were given plenty of work to do they became a terrible torment to their owner.

The Horseheath witch had five to find work for — their names Bonnie, Blue Cap, Red Cap, Jupiter and Venus. One woman spotted one on top of a box in the chimney corner — "it looked something like a mouse with very large eyes and a tail only two inches long — as soon as it was spotted it scrambled away up the chimney to report what it had seen to the witch — you cannot keep anything secret from her and her imps."

Sometimes they tried to burn the imps — that happened at West Wickham: "They put them in a well-heated brick oven but they screamed so loud that they had to be taken out and were returned to the witch — and she was covered with burns but the imps weren't marked — eventually they were put in her coffin and buried with her."

1984 07 07 - Bowd - History Revisited

Misery of life on the land, July 1984

Cambridgeshire Collection librarian MIKE PETTY takes another story from the county's past.

THE misery, penury and unhappiness of the working class in the last century has never been better illustrated than by James Bowd of Swavesey. His appalling life was recalled as he sat down at his table and wrote in September 1889. This is his story:

"I James Bowd have now reached to my 66th anniversary day and being unable to go out to labour I was sitting at home alone and my mind was taken back to the early stages of my life; I have been lame for 59 years and I can assure you it has been a great hinderance to me in my labour; I was born in the year 1823, September 27 in Swavesey; before I was seven years of age I was taken with scarlet fever and at the same time a great swelling in my throat and a white swelling on my knee which is the cause of my lameness.

"I well remember not being able to move any part of my frame but my left hand. I could just raise that but I had no strength any higher than my wrist. My doctor was a very aus-tere man he used to come and frighten me so that I dreaded to see him come, he would turn the clothes down and pull me about as if he had got a block of wood or piece of iron to handle that had no life in them. I remember him coming one day and asking my mother for a basin, he took his knife out of his pocket and came to me — I was so frightened I thought he was going to cut my throat and that should die; he cut the swelling that was on my throat and I felt a little easier from that but the fever had not abated, I was still as helpless as ever. Then he ordered leeches to be laid on me ...

But now his parents' patience with the doctor had come to an end and they borrowed a horse and cart to take the boy to Cambridge to a Doctor Zachary. "And when he saw me he said they must set their affections on this child; he ordered me to be put in a hot bath morning and night and I was to take my medicine while I was in the bath. My mother used to put the water in a washtrough and roll my shirt up under my armholes.

"This medicine was to be 10 drops in half teacupful of cold water and one time some of the medicine was spilt on my shirt and it burned all the fore part of my shirt out in a very short time and so you may guess it was not very pleasant to taste."

The boy recovered from the scarlet fever, and as his strength increased he was able to play his part in the work of the farm; at 16 years of age he was appointed head horse-keeper to Mr Dodson — "I thought how young I was to be in the place "of head horsekeeper for it was reckoned to be the first step in agricultural labour."

In 1849, aged 24, James Bowd married — "as regards our household stuff we had but very little, true I had a bed and I had a very good Family Bible but I had but very little money — must I say only three shillings — not much to start life, was it."

They lived with his parents for a while and had their first child, a girl. "But my wife had a very hard time of it we had to call the doctor in, he said he would not give a farthing for her life if it had been an hour later but by the Blessing of Almighty she began to get better."

They found a home of their own — "only two rooms and no yard or garden and the blacksmith's hammer and tongs on one side of us at four o'clock in the morning and the cobbler's hammer and lapstone on the other side till nine or 10 at night — not too much solid joy and lasting peace there."

About 1850 James Bowd began to tire of looking after horses, for one thing he needed more money, for the other it was too much walking. "Sometimes after a long day's work drilling I did not know how to get my lame leg off the ground to put it forward to take a step."

In 1852 they had a second child, another girl: "And she was such a good and quiet creature we used to say she was too good for this world, and we thought that the Lord had only lent her to us for a short time and as we thought and said so it proved to be, for she only lived one year and two weeks."

Their first son, Reuben, was born in 1855. "I was still working for Mr Dodson and the haytime came on and most of the hay was got up, and I fell off the ladder and broke my collarbone, I was six weeks before I could do any more work — then I thought I would try to see if I could get a harvest by thatching."

He got some jobs in Swavesey, then his wife went to St Ives market to meet a Mr Saberton, who farmed in Wilburton fen, and arranged for James to work there. However, on his return to Swavesey, he found work hard to find and had to struggle to support his family. When in December 1857 he was offered work at Aldreth he jumped at the opportunity: "He told me I should attend" to stock in the yard and to milk and he should want me to stack and thatch and go out with a letting out compass drill."

But this meant that he had to travel miles from home and find and pay for his own lodgings, and in February "We was burned out of house and home — we just managed to get our bed linen and bed out — the besteads were burnt, the people worked well to get out what they could but what was broke and what was burnt was a great loss to me — I had learned to know that I was bad off and I had got a very bad situation and very bad master."

When the time came to leave, James found himself in debt to his employer to the sum of £4. In September 1858 they returned to Swavesey and took lodgings at the Old Black Horse Inn. "But we was not done with Old Billy Prime the rat catcher — for that was the name he went by and he was a bad master and a dangerous man." He was taken to court in Ely and ordered to pay his debt at the rate of 4 shillings a month.

But he neglected to do so and the bailiffs were sent in. His wife borrowed the money as an advance on her wages as a cleaner in Swavesey and that debt was paid, but times continued hard and prices were very dear.

Local bakers refused supply bread — "then we began with Mr J. Crane, Fenstanton, and we soon had a very large bill with him as flour was £3 per sack."

They had a second son "but he only lived two years and two weeks" and died on June 11, 1861. Two years later came another son, James. "I was out of work. On a Plough Monday morning I went down the lane to Mr Frederick Carter and asked him to me a job, he did give me a job for some few days and as the winter was working through work began to be on the stir and he soon put me on again — regular."

The story ends abruptly, the last few pages having been torn from the book. However family sources indicate that James Bowd later obtained a post managing a small farm at Prickwillow for a London gentleman; he returned to Swavesey and became totally blind before dying, about 1895, aged 72.

1984 07 21 Casting light on early days of photography
July 1984

TODAY photography is very much part of everyday life either in newspapers, magazines or in the family album. In its early days, however, attitudes needed adjustment.

Fox Talbot, the photographic pioneer, was amazed that the time taken to photograph an entire library was exactly the same as the time taken to photograph one book! Also the camera, unlike a kindly artist, could prove merciless in portraiture.

As the "Cambridge Chronicle" pointed out in August 1844 photography is no flatterer. It shows every wrinkle and every stray hair is plainly marked; the paper was welcoming the arrival of an establishment in St Mary's Passage, Cambridge, where "Beard's patent daguerreotype or photographic portraits were now taken daily (solely by the action of light) and surely these would be more perfect when the plate is acted up in the clear atmosphere of Cambridge than in the pea-soup affair which Londoners breathe."

This was apparently the start of photography in Cambridge and soon the familiar names appear —Farren, Nichols, Squires, Hills and Saunders. In January 1870 Mr Stearn would supply six full-length album portraits for 4/6d cash, or 6/- if booked, and as early as April 1859 G. Beal, chemist, of 25 Sidney Street, was selling photographic preparations at London prices.

But these developments were not of course confined to Cambridge. Mr Sarony's American photographic portrait rooms found business in Wisbech so brisk just after harvest in 1854 that he had to delay his visit to Cambridge. In fact it was not until December 1854 that his "two remarkably neat houses on wheels" arrived at the entrance to Parker's Piece. His portraits, the "Chronicle" judged, were equal to those produced at Metropolitan establishments and there was certainly nothing more startlingly lifelike than his Stereoscopic pictures.

Sometimes, however, these itinerants were not welcome. Ely Board of Health, 1864, discussed the removal of a certain obstruction in the shape of a photographer's booth from the Market Hill. Not only were they of unsightly appearance, they also had "a tendency to injure the trade of the town and ought not be tolerated, the wants of Ely being well supplied by two resident photographers." One of these, Mr Cooke, of Market Street, lost his studio together with all its contents when the wood and glass structure mysteriously caught fire in January 1870.

In 1856 Mr Murray, a photographic artist, stayed at the Six Bells Inn, Fulbourn for several weeks, being patronised by both rich and poor. The same year the celebrated American photographic operator, W. H. Staples favoured Soham with a visit and perhaps created an impression. Certainly within a few years a local man, Henry Pendle, had set up as photographer and travelled around the village feasts although this was not without problems, at Little Downham in 1864 he had his booth damaged, but generally such practitioners were welcome.

In February 1859 Mr Monson extended the technical advances to produce a map of Cambridge, detailed enough to show lanes and byways which have of course changed greatly over the intervening years and photographs which actually show what the village or streets looked like when the camera shutter was clicked.

Some are amongst the most fascinating of the stock in the Cambridge-shire Collection. In fact last year the negatives taken by Nichols of such central areas as Petty Cury and Market

Hill some 120 years ago were acquired. His pictures were appreciated at the time — in 1867 his interior photographs of Chesterton church could be bought as souvenirs, but also call attention to the dilapidated state — dirty whitewash, ugly pews, broken-down forms which it was hoped to remedy and restore.

But photographs do not have to be old to be important. Don't throw old snapshots, negatives or slides away as "junk." They will be of interest to somebody, someday. Pop them in a parcel and leave them at your local library, or post them to me at the Cambridgeshire Collection, Lion Yard, Cambridge, and I'll find a home for them.

1984 12 08 - Jack Hobbs, legend of Cambridge cricket
CWN article 2

MIKE PETTY looks at the career of one of Cambridge's post famous sons and a cricketing master: John Berry Hobbs

JACK HOBBS played football for Cambridge Liberals during the winter months but as soon as April came he could be found, although surrounded by soccer matches, practising his true love, cricket.

The sport was literally in his blood for his father was a cricket professional on the ground staff at Fenner's and had taken his first child, John Berry Hobbs, as a babe in arms to witness a match between the University and the Australians. The young lad's excitement had been such that one of the visiting team had commented "Better make a cricketer of that kid, old man." And so it proved.

It was at Jesus College that Jack developed his natural abilities, playing on a gravel pitch in front of the servants' quarters, the wicket a tennis post, the ball a tennis ball and his bat a cricket stump. It was here, too, that he batted in his first match when, aged 10, he joined with Jesus College choir-boys in a game.

The choirboys of St Matthew's Church made him the captain of their eleven when they took on the choristers of Trinity College and Jack hit his highest score to date, three runs. But he continued to watch the skills of the undergraduates in the nets at Jesus College and soon achieved an innings of 90 runs, ended only by a disputed lbw decision which prompted the paper to report it as 90 not out, an achievement that caused his father much delight.

By now he could be found on Parker's Piece practising before school — having woken at 6 am and spent half-an-hour walking there. He returned when the schoolday was finished and all day during the summer holidays.

Jack Hobbs probably paid more for his cricket than anybody else, since the charge for a match on a prepared pitch was one shilling (5p), each player paying one penny, except the captain who had to pay twopence. Jack was often the captain.

Having left the St Matthew's Church choir eleven he founded a team known as the Ivy Cricket Club and then joined those Cambridge Liberals (playing cricket as well as football). The year 1901 was the turning point in his career when both the Liberals and the Ainsworth clubs — with whom he had connections via a Bible class — wanted him in their side for the needle-match between them. In the event they tossed for his services, Ainsworth won and Jack notched up his first century.

Jack had a cricketer hero and used to walk to the public library to see his triumphs reported in national newspapers. When Cambridge cricketer Tom Hayward took his hundred wickets in one season of first class cricket young Master Hobbs was delighted; when he found himself facing Tom's bowling in a charity match and survived to make 26 not-out he was excited beyond measure.

There could be no doubt: Jack wanted to earn his living at the game, if only by working as a groundsman like his dad. In 1902 he achieved his first professional engagement at Bedford Grammar School — coaching schoolboys at the nets. John Hobbs senior died shortly afterwards, but not before he had seen his son make a fee of 10 shillings and a score of 119 in his first professional match on Royston Heath.

It was as the newspaper reported "a long and highly meritorious innings." It was just one of very many — 197 centuries in first-class cricket alone.

The career of John Berry Hobbs progressed from strength to strength; he played for England between 1907 and 1930 and for Surrey from leaving Cambridge in 1905 until his retirement in 1935. In 1924 he published "My Cricket Memories," a copy of which is housed in the Cambridgeshire Collection. It is a tangible reminder of a local lad who made good and overlooks an area he loved and which he described as "probably the finest and most famous public cricket ground in the world."

Master with the Willow

Ely Weekly News, Friday, December 28, 1984

ROBERT Carpenter was as famous in his day as Geoff Boycott or Ian Botham are now. He made his reputation with that great cricketing county, Cambridgeshire, being one of a famous quartet of Hayward, Tarrant and Smith — four of the very finest cricketers in the world.

This was the world of the 1860s when Robert Carpenter was known internationally, having been a member of the first English cricket team to play overseas, one of the 12 men' picked for the long journey to America in September, 1859. He followed this four years later with a trip to Australia and New Zealand.

Cricket then was not the well-organised sport it is today. Wickets were rudimentary, grounds were common and such could often contain 10 good batsmen and two first-class bowlers as well as a sufficiency of resolute fieldsmen.

In such circumstances Carpenter batted for nine hours to make 121 runs at a match at Ballarat, New Zealand in 1863 before making the seven-week sea voyage home.

Robert Carpenter was born on November 18, 1830, in Mill Road, Cambridge, then an undeveloped area on the outskirts of the town and separated from it by that great nursery of good cricket, Parker's Piece. His early promise on that ground was evident when as a boy he amassed more runs than the entire team of 11 opponents.

His first professional appearance was at Godmanchester in 1854 and four years later, aged 28, he was chosen for the United All-England Eleven who played Eighteen of Christ College Oxford. His score of 38 earned him selection for the next match when United played an All-England Eleven at Lords.

From then on a place in first class matches was always open to him and the cricket record books record his scores — 97 at Lords in 1859, 119 at the Oval the following year, 100 for his county Cambridgeshire, against Surrey and so on. In total over a period of 22 years he played 766 innings against the best bowling that England could produce — an impressive record. Praise came from one of his contemporaries: "I think I never saw a man to punish a slow bowler as Carpenter was. He would go down the wicket and hit the ball like a horse kicking."

Another who knew him well was W. G. Grace, who commented that "the bowler had all his work cut out to get Carpenter's wicket, whatever the state of the ground — shooting or bumping balls were confidently met. Batsman after batsman was beaten on a kicking wicket but he remained, keeping the straight ones down, punishing the loose balls and breaking the hearts of many a twenty-two who saw victory slipping out of their grasp owing to his patience and coolness."

After 1876, aged 46, Carpenter, having lost his comrades Hayward and Tarrant and with Cambridgeshire no longer a major cricketing force, turned to umpiring, continuing in that role for over 20 years.

In 1897 A. W. Spratt produced a short account of the career of this distinguished Cambridge sportsman, which the Cambridgeshire Collection acquired at publication and retains to this day. Its intention was to urge others to make some small provision for the old age of this great cricketer who finally died in July, 1901, at his house in Mill Road, having returned from umpiring a match in Liverpool two days previously. The "Cambridge Graphic" devoted nearly two pages of its issue of July 20, 1901, to an appreciation and obituary of one of the really great batsmen of his time.

CWN 1985 02 07

THE Cambridgeshire Collection receives material every day but the small black note-book headed "Cambridge Gleanings" was presented in 1879.

The donor was C.M. Wilson, but who compiled it is a mystery as it comprises newspaper snippets which range in date from 1678 and 1862.

The cuttings cover many topics but in particular reflect the difficulties and dangers which afflicted travellers in those distant days. The language of the reporters is as interesting as the stories they recount...

"John Todd was Robbed by three Highwaymen, between Kentford and Newmarket ... on the 23rd day of April last, of a black pacing Gelding, shod of his hinder feet with interfering shoes. The one a lusty portly man, with a coloured castor hat, mounted upon a bay Gelding, about 14 hands, his hind-feet white. The second a lusty young man, appalled in black, with a light-coloured Riding Coat, a brown Periwig, mounted upon a brown silver-haired Gelding, a white Star on his forehead. The third a low thick man, with a new gray cloth Coat, his hair brown, mounted on a black Gelding, with some silver hairs on his forehead. Whoever can discover the aforesaid persons, or give intelligence of the Gelding taken away, let them repair to Mr John Todd Haberdasher of Hats in St Edmondsbury, or to Mr Gervase Locks Haberdasher of Hats upon London bridge, and they shall be well rewarded."

The mere business of travel could be dangerous:

1721:

"On Friday last an unfor-tunate Accident happen'd at Barlow in the Road to Cambridge: As one Mr James Eaton, a young Gentleman, Student in Physick, was riding through that Town on a full Gallop, his Horse pitching on his Head threw him forward, and then tumbling over his Body with his whole Weight, bruised him so violently that he vomited great Quantities of Blood; and tho' several Means very proper in that Case were made use, yet he expired in a few Hours after."

Inclement weather added to the difficulties.

"The heavy rain which fell on Sunday, Monday, and early on Tuesday morning last caused the greatest flood in these parts that has been known for upwards of 60 years ... It carried away part of the bridge at Hauxton-Mills; and en-dangered the lives of many in passing the different roads that lead to this town, and prevented the post from arriving here till Wednesday which should have come in on Tuesday noon, and the stages of Tuesday did not arrive here till Wednesday noon. The post-boy, in passing a water at Buntingford, was thrown down, and narrowly escaped being drowned by hanging on some brickwork of the bridge; the horse was drowned, and with very great difficulty the mail re-covered."

Even when the journey had come to an end there were still potential disasters:

1813:

"Last week, as the Stam-ford coach was turning into the Blue Boar gateway, at Cambridge, heavily laden with boxes, one of them fell upon the Rev Mr Bonney, Fellow of Clare Hall, and materially injured him. During the confusion which ensued a box belonging to one of the passengers was thrown off the top of the coach, and broken to pieces. The contents were scat-tered about the yard, and among them was a pocket-book containing £300 in Bank of England notes, which has not since been heard of."

CWN article 4

AMONG the invita-tions the Cambridge-shire Collection has received recently was one to a party on Parker's Piece which the organisers claimed "will transfix future ages with astonish-ment."

But it has largely been forgotten, overshadowed by a greater celebration for the Coronation of Queen Vic-toria 24 years later. For this party was held on July 12, 1814, to com-memorate victory over Napoleon — though history was to show that Napoleon was in fact not yet beaten.

When the news broke in Cambridge on June 27, 1814, that a treaty had been signed in Paris between France and the Allies — Britain, Germany and Russia — the town celebrated, the Mayor and Corporation breakfasted at Town Hall and proceeded "in grand procession with an excellent band of music" around the town, reading the procla-mation at various points.

Shops and colleges illuminated their premises - Mr Deighton, bookseller, decorated four of his win-dows - the left hand depicting "Peace and Plenty," the two middle ones a soldier and a sailor "Returned from War" and the other a shepherd watching sheep, with a dis-tant view of ships sailing, the motto "Peace and Commerce." Elsewhere, the Duke of Wellington, Britannia, Nelson and John Bull were depicted.

When a real hero, the Prussian General Blucher, visited Cambridge - the man who had entered Paris - his carriage was drawn into town by numerous inhabitants. It was conveyed across the Market Hill and even carried down the steps into the Great Court of Trinity College, where he was to dine at a superb banquet along with 500 guests of great literary and political status.

Many of the leading figures of the town dined together at the Red Lion Inn and agreed that the poorer classes too should be able to participate in the general celebrations. The Mayor called a public meeting at which it was unanimously agreed to give a public dinner on Parker's Piece for those who wished to partake of it and a subscription was set up to raise £1,000 to defray expenses.

Committees were set up to make the arrangements: 5,388lb of beef, 5,820 penny loaves, 485lb of Gloucester cheese and much more was needed for the guests; tables had to be borrowed, table cloths supplied, along with 480 salt saucers. A bandstand was constructed in the middle, crowned with the Union Flag, while below it flew, submissively, the standard captured from the American frigate Chesapeake.

To keep gatecrashers away — and more than 15,000 spectators were expected — rope fences were constructed through which nobody could pass unless they had a ticket (which were specially designed by R. B. Harraden, the famous Cambridge artist).

The tables were decorated with banners, streamers waved in the wind as the 6,000 guests sat down to their fare of beef and plum puddings. While they ate - and the crowds watched hungrily - a balloon rose majestically and the orchestra played. Afterwards the lady snuff-takers enjoyed the half a peck supplied and the men turned to their pipes - 1,728 of them, with 52lb of tobacco. All agreed it had been a good day.

Apart from three: a gentleman and his lady were somewhat upset when their gig overturned into a ditch near Midsummer Common. They were rescued from a muddy grave by the bystanders. Although the lady's frock was ruined, her blushes were saved by a university gentleman who lent her his gown.

More serious was an accident to one of the guests who fell in the crush and broke his leg, leaving a wife and family without any income; a subscription was opened and two rounds of beef and half a cheese were sent to tide them over. The rest of the food was distributed to the aged and infirm and to the prisoners in the County Gaol on Castle Hill.

The day concluded with rustic sports on Midsummer Common that included a "Jingle match" for a hat value 15 shillings, donkey races, a "smoking match"; some chased a pig with a soaped tail, others dipped in a pail of water for an eel while six chimney-sweeps in their working clothes dipped in a bowl of flour for a shilling, the one who found it receiving a prize of seven shillings.

Thus ended the Cambridge peace celebration of June 12, 1814. By March the following year Bonaparte had escaped from Elba and was back in Paris. Blucher was forced to join forces with the Duke of Wellington to fight the Battle of Waterloo, at which 30,000 were killed and more than 58,000 wounded. It was to be July 15, 1815, before Napoleon finally surrendered and over 170 years before I got my invitation

When beer was only a penny a pint .

Prices have changed somewhat over the past 75 years. In 1910 Bailey and Tebbutt's sparkling bottle beer was 2½ d (1p) a pint, wallpaper 1½d a roll, a set of false teeth could cost £1, while a top London Civil Servant earned the amazing salary of £1,800 per annum.

Some prices have re-mained static — a dog licence was 7s 6d (37½ p) whilst, incredibly, others have even dropped, for in those days you would have paid 1d for your copy of the "Cambridgeshire Weekly News" with its guaranteed largest circulation of all Cambridgeshire papers.

Insurance was free: £200 would be paid by the Ocean, Accident and Guarantee Corporation should any-body be killed on railway train, tramcar, omnibus or steamboat provided they had signed the policy printed on page 58 of "Westrope's Year Book, Almanack, Diary and Local Guide" for 1910.

This was published in Cottenham and provided information for 15 villages in the area. It listed the councillors, gave times of church services and details of travel arrangements for both J. Blunt and G. H. Merchant would convey passengers and parcels on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays through to Cam-bridge for a shilling (5p) return.

Advertisements show that Cottenham folk could get most of their necessities in the village — glycerine grease from Todd's stores, cherry cider from George Wolfe, mineral water manufacturers; tea from Hazels "who knows the peculiarities of the water" and can advise on the best; Harold Bell would frame your pictures, Mr Lucchesi mend your clock and G. H. Whitehead built your "Senior Wrangler" cycle.

Westrope packed his directory with a wealth of interesting articles about the area past and present. He recorded the opening on August 19th 1909 of the new organ at Willingham Tabernacle - powered by a petrol engine; he bemoaned the problems of "crooked Histon" which was "notor-ious for its many corners" and whose residents had refused to install street lights despite the new gas main being laid right through the village.

Oakington was much more advanced and a flying machine was actually being constructed there in a "mysterious barn," in October 1909 the "Grose-Feary No 2 All British Monoplane" had been ex-hibited in a marquee when a great many onlookers had flocked to the village to marvel and stare.

Some of the articles go back to the distant past, recalling the "Wonderful Willingham Boy" who had rapidly grown to manhood and been exhibited throughout the kingdom because of his size and strength before dying aged five years and 10 months in 1745. Elsewhere five pages were devoted to a compli-cated dispute over manorial rights in Cottenham in 1596 and the possibility that Belsars Hall, near Rampton, might have been the base at which William the Con-queror made his attack on Hereward the Wake and his men on the Isle of Ely way back in 1072.

But the main interest lies in the contemporary news. Cottenham was expanding slowly — two handsome villas here, four cottages there; two public houses had closed — the "Lord Nelson" and the "Lamb" but the "White Horse" was soon to re-open following renovation. Apart from an epidemic of whooping cough the village was healthy, perhaps due to the new horse brush now used for sweeping the streets.

Of course there were im-provements which ought to be made — a light railway, a motor omnibus service to Cambridge, a bridge at Twenty Pence, cheaper gas, better drainage and sewerage. But at least some of the streets were lit by gas during the winter months, and the parish council had repaved part of the High Street. The inhabitants, Westrope noted, are generally "of a thrifty nature and one would have to travel a great distance to find another place with the same population (2,400 people) in such a prosperous condition."

The Cambridge Collection holds several editions Westrope's directories but would welcome the opportunity to acquire more which we can preserve others to make use of.

How Guilden Morden learned the sad fate of the ship Cataraqui

DURING the early years of Queen Victoria's reign, Cambridgeshire was a depressed area. Haddenham, the newspaper reported, "was rapidly falling into obscurity," 50 acres of good arable land could find no buyers, small tradesmen were facing bankruptcy, cottages and small tenements were daily becoming unoccupied and gangs of unemployed labourers wandered around the village.

Such was the poverty and distress that people were increasingly opting to leave their native soils and seek their fortune overseas. The journey they faced was long and hazardous and it was often many years before those left behind learned of their fate. Sadly this was not the case at Guilden Morden in 1845.

Amos and Fanny Pierce and their seven children joined William and Sarah Izard, the Smith family and Thomas Pettengell, his wife and child = 23 in all – en route to their new lives. They left Liverpool on board the emigrant ship Cataraqui on April 20 along with 346 fellow passengers and set sail for Melbourne, Australia. They sailed south all through May, June and July and in August were almost there.

On Saturday night, August 3, the ship hove to because of a gale which had abated sufficiently for progress to be resumed at 3 am. At half past four on the Sunday morning, "it being quite dark and raining hard, blowing a fearful gale and the sea running mountains high," the ship struck a reef on the west coast of King's Island at the entrance to the Bass Straits.

Four feet of water flooded the hold and the hundreds of emigrants below deck struggled to get out, but the ladders gave way in the buffeting and the crew and fellow passengers laboured to pull them up bodily until 300 were huddled on a deck which was constantly swept by the sea breaking over it.

Thirty minutes later the ship careered right over on to her side and those still below drowned. The others clung to anything they could find and waited for daylight. As it became brighter, they could see the bodies of their travelling companions bobbing around them in the water and now only 200 people were left. They could see the shore but had no hope of reaching it through the raging storm.

All day they hung to the wreck while the sea broke over them, each wave washing somebody away. At 4 pm the ship began to break up and within the hour just 70 were left crowded on the forecabin. All night the winds raged and the rain pelted down, some lost their hold and fell overboard, others drowned where they were lashed.

As day broke for the second time, only 30 were alive and the remorseless waves smashed more of the wreck into matchwood. Thomas Guthrie, the chief mate, watched as the captain made a valiant attempt to reach the shore but was forced back and ended up clinging to the bows with 18 or 20 dead bodies around him, until he too slipped away.

Eventually Thomas could take it no more and in desperation seized a plank under his arm and leaped into the water, where by some miracle he was carried over the reef and on to the shore.

Others followed — able seamen Roberts, Jones, Miller, Simpson, Robinson and Johnson, apprentice William Blackstock and one emigrant, Solomon Brown.

Of the Cambridgeshire contingent there was no living sign, although bodies arrived regularly and were buried in the sand. Of the 423 souls who set out from Liverpool, only nine survived.

Thomas and his companions were rescued some five weeks later and landed at Hobson Bay on September 13, 1845, where they told of their horrendous experiences.

The news was reprinted in one newspaper after another and it was not until the "Cambridge Chronicle" of February 7, 1846, that the relatives and friends in Guilden Morden learned that Thomas, Amos, Fanny, William and Sarah and the others had failed in their attempt to make a new life for themselves.

Soham in the 1840s

William Playford was concerned about what Soham people were reading in 1847. So he decided to do something about it by publishing his own "Playford's Soham Magazine and Friendly Monitor."

Each month it included articles on natural history around the world such as boa constrictors or pet snakes in the forests of Java. It contained a miscellany section ... "in the stillness of the night a steam vessel announces its approach by the sound of the splashing of its paddles when 15 miles from harbour."

The children's page gave facts worth remembering: "the 14th January is on average the coldest day of the year... the first railway coach was from Stockton to Darlington with one horse, 12 miles in one hour and a quarter ... the National Debt is £800 million."

There were many articles on morality and fervent opposition to "Popery." In Ireland "you find wretchedness and want, insubordination and dissatisfaction pervading almost every circle — the minister of peace burned in the public streets amidst the shouts of a priest-ridden people"

His correspondents expressed disquiet about their own town at the time, incendiarism was rife "seven tenements and three farm yards consumed and if some decisive and effectual steps are not taken every thatched building in the place will be destroyed": it was high time policemen were employed — a sentiment the editor endorsed "there is not a respectable inhabitant who does not feel that the condition of our streets, particularly on Sunday evenings, is in the highest degree disgraceful."

Times were hard and while one urged new arrangements for poor relief to discourage working men from squandering their money in public houses others proffered tips on how they could cope.

A regular feature was entitled "Economical hints" and was written by a Lady to her female servant about to get married; her message was clear "all waste is sin and I wish to enforce economy in the most minute article." Tidiness was of the essence, there should be "no litter, no dirty corner or drawer and especially in the bed room where one should shake out singly every article of bed clothes over the back of a chair and leave it whilst kindling the fire; never omit mopping under the bed every morning and removing every particle of dust as quickly as it collects."

Economise over food, even pork, the cheapest meat since many families kept their own pigs: "bones will digest over and over again when placed in an iron pan with a little water and left to simmer . . . they produce a soup more nutritious than could possibly be imagined."

Her hints went further: "Collect all bones, fat and scraps that you would otherwise throw away, put them in a pan, cover with water and let simmer all evening and all night; in the morning when the soup is cold remove all the fat from it, this you may use to fry pancakes or potatoes. Drain the soup from the dregs at the bottom, add a teacup full of pease in a bag, a little onion, pepper and mint and boil well together. If it is not as good as you could wish add a spoonful of made mustard and serve with nice crisp toast."

She was under little doubt: "Your husband when returning cold and hungry from his day's work, if he finds this quite ready on his arrival, will probably make it suffice for his supper with the addition of a little bread and cheese. What a pleasure to think that by a little management you have saved the expense of one meal of animal food

Should the marriage survive the food then children were to be expected "When an infant is newly-born, you should never omit giving it a teaspoonful of castor oil; it prevents many complaints that they are subject to. In case of measles, chicken-pock etc.... a small quantity of weak onion tea often assists. As agues are so prevalent here, the most frugal and ready remedy is the snuff of a candle. You may mix it with a little honey, treacle or some other sweet that may disguise it and you need not tell your patient what it is"! She had remedies for other things too, from weak eyes a mixture of sugar and lead, water and laudanum — but does point out that sugar of lead is a very strong poison.

With its mixture of morality, facts worth remembering and many other similar features "Playfords Soham Magazine and Friendly Monitor" is among the less consulted items in the Cambridgeshire Collection. But it does offer an interesting insight into a community over 138 years ago which one correspondent hoped would soon be brought "into direct communication with civilised society."

When boys work was in street or chimney, by Mike Petty

UNEMPLOYMENT is not a problem peculiar to the 1980s as Margaret Neville Keynes emphasised when in 1911 she produced her report entitled "The problem of boy labour in Cambridge"

She analysed the 437 boys who left school between July 1908 and July 1910 and found the majority went into unskilled work — eight as butchers' boys, 19 newspaper boys who "can fairly easily earn from three to seven shillings a week in the evenings" but "there is little inducement when they leave school for them to take regular all-day work for lower wages than they have earned in the evenings alone" and they tended to loaf about during the day. Telegraph boys on the other hand were fairly treated — "the boys have not long hours, they learn to be smart, obedient and orderly. They have compulsory evening classes which are very popular and if there is no permanent opening for them they are dismissed before they are too old to take up other work."

The most popular job was errand boy which claimed 167 of the school-leavers. It was a job which offered working hours from eight in the morning to eight at night with just one half-holiday a week - though not in term time and this left the youngsters too tired to go to evening classes.

The problem was however, that one day the employer told him that he had really outgrown the work and that a younger boy was coming to take his place, then at the age of 17 or 18 they found themselves out of work with no training.

"They become labourers ... or they enter the Army" - and of course three years later, just as these school-leavers were the right age, there was a considerable demand for soldiers in the slaughter of the Great War.

One category that does not feature in Margaret Neville's jobs surveys was chimney boys - but they would have been far too old at 13½ to undertake such work anyway, as a Government report of 1819 emphasised.

"Little boys for small flues" was the phrase in the cards left at the door by itinerant chimney sweepers - for flues less than 9 inches square needed small children to climb them, children aged from five to six years old who still needed to climb keeping their arms straight up, for if they brought them down they got jammed in the chimney; some were so narrow that should the child's shirt get rumpled as he climbed then this was enough to trap him in the blackness of the sooty chimney, forcing his master to cut him out.

Even when chimneys were wider the climbing boys — and girls — rubbed their knees and elbows raw, soot got on their eyes and they developed cancers, though as a doctor testified these were not "altogether fatal unless they will not submit to the operation — they have such a dread of the operation they will not submit to it ... without the operation it is death.

Often chimneys had to be climbed during the few hours of the day when fires were not needed, the children having to arrive outside the servants' door at 4 o'clock on a winter's morning and waiting for admission, shivering on the doorstep for perhaps half-an-hour.

More worrying, however was when a large party had been invited to dinner and the kitchen chimney caught fire an hour before it was time to serve; "all eyes are turned upon the sable consolation of the master chimney sweeper and up into the midst of the burning chimney is sent one of the miserable little infants of the brush. There is a positive prohibition of the practice in one of the Acts of Parliament but what matter Acts of Parliament when the pleasures of genteel people are concerned, or what is a toasted child compared to the agonies of the mistress of the house."

Certain children were kept in readiness for such an emergency — sometimes even they could not cope and been forced to call out. "It is so hot I cannot go any further" at which the master would heave a pail of water down from above, drenching the child in a mixture of water and burning soot and then often "because I could not do it I was taken home and well hid with a brush by the journeyman."

The poor, blackened, burnt and often crippled children did have some break from their employment as the testimony elicited: "Is it generally the custom that many masters are also nightmen" "Yes I forgot that circumstance, which is very grievous. I have been tied around the middle and let down several privies for the purpose of fetching watches and such things; it is generally the practice to take the smallest boy, to let him through the hole, without taking up the seat..."

In many ways the children Margaret Keynes surveyed 100 years later who were experiencing the horror of trench warfare had the easier life.

When the lights went out all over the fens

AS the Burwell woman made her way upstairs to bed at 9.40 on an August evening in 1916 she was un-aware that her movements were being watched from the street by a professional peeping Tom. What he saw resulted in her 65-year-old husband being fined £2 at Newmarket court.

For six minutes the light from her candle had been clearly visible and if PC Frank Rawlinson could see it then so could an enemy Zeppelin.

Cambridgeshire in 1916 was acutely aware of the danger from airship bombing. In May Wicken feast had been a less than usually bright affair as stallkeepers had needed to make do without lights, whilst ever-efficient Little Downham (where rumours insisted that anti-aircraft guns had been installed) could claim in January that so effective was their blackout that one could walk down the village street without seeing a light stronger than a glimmer.

Ely had made preparations in event of air-raid. The Volunteer Training Corps had given instruction in first aid, Messrs Halls brewery had stretchers and Mrs Chase of The Palace had put aside 12 beds for casualties. The police would give warning of impending attack. By then there had already been a raid on Eastern England when in January the War Office confirmed that six or seven airships had passed over and according to Luther Brooks' "An old fenman remembers" some of the 220 bombs had fallen in Isleham Fen. But of this there is no record in the local newspaper, though the Urban Council was told that one man had actually gone out with a lantern looking for the Zeppelins.

There is no doubt of a later raid when on August 1, 1916, a raider was heard approaching just after midnight, the faint buzz from its silencers attracting the attention of the local stationmaster who could make out the shape of the Zeppelin high in the starry sky. Helplessly he watched as an incendiary bomb fell on the edge of a ditch setting fire to the dry grass and allowing the enemy crew to select their target. Half a minute later two high explosive bombs exploded simultaneously and two more incendiaries followed before the airship moved off north east.

News of the attack spread like wildfire, people flocked to view the devastation and attracted a London newspaper correspondent to describe the scene. this way to the 'Zep' pits. Admission threepence. Proceeds for the hospital and the farmer's crops," said the policeman directing the enormous queue who filed through the farm gate where the farmer's wife sat counting the money and allowing the more favoured visitors to examine the top of one of the bombs which she had discovered. The damage comprised two holes in a potato field, each just deep enough for children to play hide and seek in. But the residents suffered more inconvenience since the hoards of thirsty visitors had drained the last drop of beer from the local pub and forced it to close its doors.

The few brief paragraphs ignore the impact of such an attack on an isolated community which affected the lives of fenland folk to whom the explosions that rocked their cottages and brought the tin baths in the wash-house crashing to the floor were a terrifying glimpse of the horror being experienced by loved ones overseas. They would never forget the night they were involved in a conflict that filled the local paper with heart-breaking lists of dead, wounded and missing neighbours, sons and husbands — week after week after week. Despite all this careless women still showed lights at their bedroom windows and their husbands had to pay the consequences.

Intricate intrigues of the Victorian political arena

CAMBRIDGE in the 1840s was a marginal constituency. Often political arguments were not enough to ensure success and both parties resorted to other means of encouraging voters —by bribery.

In 1839 the member of Parliament was deprived of his seat following an enquiry and when in 1843 Fitzroy Kelly polled just 95 more votes than his opponent, Richard Foster, the allegations of "bribery" were again raised.

A parliamentary committee was appointed to investigate and unravelled various tales of corruption and malpractice which shed some light on the Victorian political system. William Smithers had certainly been given £13 1s 9d, when he refused to vote until the money due to him for refreshments provided at the previous election had been paid. Defence lawyers tried to blacken his character — was it not true that he had been convicted of bigamy in 1830 and fined 1s, and had he not married yet again and was now living with a fourth woman? Yes, it was true but this did not make the bribery any less serious, the committee agreed and found the case proved.

Thomas Hurley claimed that Samuel Long had told him: "If you like to vote for Mr Kelly I will take care you do have some money and if you like I will give you some now," holding out several sovereigns and offering one on account. But Hurley had declined to take it and had voted for Foster — the suspicion was that he had been a spy for the other side.

The case of William Wilderspin was less straightforward; he was a shoemaker in Burleigh Street and owed £7 10s in rent to his landlord, a supporter of Richard Foster. He explained his predicament to Mr Kelly himself — he dare not vote in opposition to his landlord's feelings whilst he was so indebted to him, Kelly promised to sort things out. Thus on the day before the election Wilderspin went along to the Old English Gentleman in Barnwell. The derelict pub had been opened up, furniture, candles and other equipment taken in and four rooms made usable.

One of these upstairs was for the use of the University gentlemen who formed a part of the Watch committee — their job was to patrol the streets and keep watch for members of the other party who might be bribing voters and this they did in cap and gown, carrying short thick sticks and wearing false moustachios and whiskers. When not on the street they enjoyed quantities of wine, brandy and gin which were consumed until the early hours of the morning.

William, however, had business in the small room occupied by Dr Southey, a prominent surgeon, who promised that the rent would be taken care of, provided he cast his vote for Fitzroy Kelly. On the morning of the election Wilderspin again returned to the Old English Gentleman to see Southey. He arrived there at seven o'clock but the doctor did not appear; fortified with a glass of sherry — the first he had had in 10 years — he refused the offer of a carriage to the polling place and elected to walk, escorted by other members of the committee. He paused for a glass of brandy in a private house, then moved on to the Elephant and Castle for a glass of ale but then decided not to vote until the afternoon.

Later he returned to the Elephant seeking Dr Southey, again he was unsuccessful but was definitely assured that provided he voted the rent would be paid. At this he made his way to Parker's Piece where the hustings were erected.

The hustings comprised a platform from which the candidates could address the voters and behind it seven polling booths, one for each ward. It was not however a secret ballot and following the election a poll book would be published which clearly showed for whom each elector had cast his vote.

William approached the polling clerk to declare his support for Mr Kelly and obtain the ticket on which would be entered his polling number — department G, number 924. He watched the clerk fill in the details but also noticed somebody hand a card to the official. This marked the end of his hopes for the small card indicated an objection to his vote — perhaps one of the watchmen for the other candidate had noticed his discussions with Fitzroy Kelly's supporters — and he was taken to the Mayor's booth nearby where he would be made to swear on oath that he had accepted no bribe.

Fortunately before the oath could be administered four o'clock struck and the poll was closed. The poll book records the letters "B.O" indicating that he was sent to take the oath, there is no mark in either the Kelly or the Foster column since the vote was never placed. The committee deliberated whether bribery had occurred in this case, by 4 votes to 3 they decided it had not. William never got his money and when he came before the inquiry he was still behind in his rent - though part had been paid off with money earned by his wife taking in laundry. After the long deliberations and having asked thousands of questions the committee agreed that Kelly had in fact been duly elected — but it was a split decision, -4 votes to 3.

JOHN BROWN'S schooldays started in Barnwell and ended in Cambridge; by the time he was ten years old he was ahead of his classmates in book-learning and mischief, and then disaster struck.

His father died, leaving the family butcher's business to an uncle who bankrupted it within two years. John, his mother and the five other children were penniless.

Other butchers rallied around and allowed them to become 'drovers' to earn a few pence. In those days, 1808, the stock-market was held in St Ives and John and his brother Bill needed to be on the road by three o'clock on the Monday morning to walk the 13 miles and be ready to mark the sheep purchased by the various butchers, some with red ochre, some with tar, before herding them into paddocks just outside the town.

When the entire drove was assembled the boys trudged the road to Cambridge with the 300 or 400 sheep, trying to keep them from running into adjacent fields, and eventually arriving, numb with cold, at 9 o'clock. Next day the flock was divided into constituent parts and delivered to the individual butchers in Cambridge and surrounding villages.

It was not a job on which to base a career and John sought an apprenticeship as a shoemaker. Sadly he chose a bad master and although he proved himself most proficient in his trade he suffered from poor accommodation in a garret said to be haunted and was beaten several times. Once he struck back and found himself in prison.

Eventually they parted and the boy went to London to seek his fortune. He obtained work as a shoemaker, went to sea, acted on the London stage and one day while walking down the Strand chanced into a Billiard parlour. Never having seen the game he went in and watched the match in progress. He also witnessed the game of Pool, studied it closely and then tried his hand.

Years later when he returned to Cambridge he took up the position of licensee of the Fort St George public house on Midsummer Common, building up trade to some £10 to £12 a day. In his spare moments he practised his billiard strokes on the bagatelle table which was among the attractions of the pub. It was not to last, one thing led to another and again he became penniless.

Once more he deserted Cambridge, once more he returned. This time he bought an old wooden billiards table and began to give instruction. Success prompted him to expand, he made his own slate table, chiselling and grinding the surface by hand until it was ready.

At first he hoped to limit his clientele to respectable tradesmen but they had no time to attend and failure again loomed. Salvation came in the shape of a group of "elite" young men from Trinity College enraptured with - not billiards - but pool.

That evening he made half-a-guinea, he had not taken so much money for months. He now catered exclusively for members of the University and business boomed, his tables, rooms and appointments were acknowledged to be the best in town, his customers were of the very first order.

Then the University authorities decided to prohibit their students from playing billiards and pool but John had been beaten so often he decided to fight back.

Warning bells were hidden throughout the playing rooms, lookouts placed by the doors; whenever the Proctor was sighted whistles were blown, the bells rang and the players fled through a secret window. At the same time the gas light was turned off at the mains and the official found only a blackened and deserted room. Frustrated by all this the University officials became desperate, sneaking up on one of the lookouts in an attempt to prevent him raising the alarm.

A tussle ensued, the lookout was struck, the University man was taken to court and fined 20/-. After other incidents the University capitulated, billiards were permitted, John Brown went from strength to strength.

By 1858 he owned two public rooms in Ram Yard for pool and billiards together with seven private billiards rooms and a racket-court. He was master of the largest establishment of its kind in the provinces, second only to one in London. When aged 63 he sat down to write his autobiography entitled "Sixty years gleanings from life's harvest" the Barnwell boy could feel content with his lot.

Silver Street Toll

JAMES Ratcliffe had been a dealer in earthenware back in the 1790s and he had always paid the fee whenever he was caught by the toll-collector, although sometimes he went to Cambridge early and came out late so that he got away without payment. He later became a toll-collector himself. Then there was the old widow woman, Mrs Morris, who did the job in 1760, she walked along with a stick who put the money in a hob!;r which she always carried.

William Royston was a carrier at Hardwick as his father had been before him. As a lad he remembered going to Mr Beale's at Cambridge to deliver corn for milling or to collect coal, sometimes they went over the Small Bridges and down Silver Street, sometimes not, but if they were spotted they always paid the toll and had their waggon marked with chalk — a different colour each day. Of course if they came in empty — or had arranged the load so that the collector could not see it above the side of the cart — they were not charged.

For as long as people could remember Cambridge Corporation had demanded a toll of 2d for every loaded waggon that came into town, if it was unloaded there was another 2d charge and if it took a fresh load that was 2d more.

If the carrier refused to pay then his goods were distrained — Mr Beales had lost six halters at different times as since October 1824 he had refused to pay the tolls — they were a "grievous tax upon the industrious people who bring provisions to the town to supply the necessities of its inhabitants."

In justification for the charge the Corporation claimed that it needed the money to pay for the up-keep of the streets and bridges. There had been a bridge at Silver Street for centuries and in the old days there used to be a hermit who took tolls and repaired the bridge and history recorded that when he died in 1494 the Corporation had had to make the bridge passable again so quickly had it deteriorated. They rebuilt it in 1648 and were always being forced to pay out for repairs.

However, others pointed out that, as a result of an Act of Parliament in 1788, these responsibilities had been transferred to a new body, the Cambridge Improvement Commissioners who were authorised to levy taxes for road repair. Why then should people pay twice, and what were the Corporation spending their toll-money on anyway?

Was the £700 spent on the town's prison or prosecuting wrong-doers? No, for that came from the High Constable's rate which also paid for the expenses of the Aldermen who undertook duties at the Petty Sessions. Did the money go to subsidise the poor, the disabled soldiers or sailors that were always present? No, for that too came out from other rates.

Weston Hatfield, editor of the Cambridge Independent Press, was convinced that he knew where the money was going — "on scenes of riot and gluttony, on feasts monthly, annual and occasional on every pretext, on midnight orgies" for councillors. It was an example of the corruption of the Corporation in 1824 just part of the sad state of affairs at that time.

So, in 1824, Messrs Beales and Company refused to pay the tolls and were taken to court. The trial involved extensive readings from ancient documents dating back to the Domesday Book; charters and statutes were quoted, legal arguments raised.

The hearing lasted for a day and a hair, by the end of which, the Lord Chief Justice "was so inaudible from exhaustion" that he could scarcely be heard as he summed up the case. The jury had no doubts: the case was found in Beales' favour, the Corporation had no right to the tolls they had collected for so many years.

Two more cases followed, the Corporation won the second but lost the decider and its income was halved. No longer would Cambridge carriers need to fear the toll collector with his "harsh passively-compelling visage, uncharged with any feeling whatsoever save the stern resolve to withstand passage until the sum was paid."

In Cambridge at least the streets were free — until the advent of the Traffic War-den.

John Denson

IN Godmanchester nearly half the labourers were dependent on the poor relief in 1829, no wonder the parish had to find over £2,000 that year.

Payment was based on the price of bread, a single man should have four loaves a week, a married man with four children was allowed 12. But even when a man was in work his wages of 20s (£1) in 1812 would buy only nine loaves and the parish poor rate would have to pay the extra 6s 3d (37p) to bring him up to subsistence level.

Expenditure on poor relief nationwide had doubled over 20 years. Without money the poor could not afford to buy — pork meat had to be priced down from 10s 6d (52p) to 4s 6d (22p) per stone before it could be sold, manufacturers found themselves without a mar-~~ket~~.

John Denson, of Waterbeach, had his thoughts on the cause and its remedy which he published in let-~~ters~~ to the "Cambridge Chronicle" newspaper and reprinted in 1830 under the title "A peasant's voice to landowners on the best means of benefiting agri-cultural labourers." Part of the problem was the declining standards of farmers. What would their ancestors — who really were farmers — have said if they could see the farm-house full of servants with bells to "summon Betty to light the parlour fire, clean the bright stove, to brush the carpet, to shine your Honour's and Master Jackey Jackenape's boots ... to see you with your tea-urn and at dinner with your finger glasses, trifle dishes. How prodigiously the old ladies would stare, and well they might. I have seen a modern farmer's wife run away from the sight of her own cows; and had she happened to encounter one of her hus-band's old sows with its pigs ... she would have gone into hysterics..."

The modern farmers spent more on dinner and wine on market day than would keep a labourer's family for a week. And while the farmers were drinking port wine for-tified with brandy many a labourer was drinking water out of a ditch or stagnant pond.

With more and more big farms the labourer had to work too far from home to go back for a hot meal; nor was he now allowed firing to cook in the field. In the old days he boarded with the farmer during harvest and was allowed two loads of straw to litter his pigs and heat the oven and was allowed to use the farm cart to take home firing. Now all that was finished, along with the traditional harvest home supper at the big house.

Previously too his wife would be allowed to glean not only wheat but also barley, beans and peas which helped to keep a pig or pay shoemakers bills, now all that was fed to the farmers own hogs.

Part of the problem too was modern machinery. Horse-ploughing might be quicker than hand cultivation but could not produce the same crops and as for the "infernal" threshing machine why "had it not been for this not one man here would not be out of employ, now one machine does as much work in three days as would em-~~ploy~~ a man throughout the winter."

Nor was it as good as the old flail, since when the flail was used the straw was turned out at the barn door to be browsed over by cattle, thus converting a portion of the straw to animal food with the rest making excellent manure for the land. Now the straw was thrown into a large heap "comparatively worthless."

With no work to be done on the farm the men had to work for the parish, digging gravel for repairing roads. If they were not needed they had to trudge four miles to the principal farm to see if there was a job and have their name taken "lest they meet with some little job and thereby defraud the parish."

By treating a man with such suspicion you under-mined his pride "treat him as a rascal and you take the surest way to make him one," was a common observation. When a man had to apply for relief "he became degraded in his own eyes."

John Denson urged that each man be given access to half an acre of land that he could work and produce his own food. Today village allotments still supplement many families' diets. One wonders whether other remedies for current problems might be found in the writings of a self-confessed Cambridge-shire 'Peasant' of 150 years ago.

MIKE PETTY looks at the career of one of Cambridge's post famous sons and a cricketing master: John Berry Hobbs

JACK HOBBS played football for Cambridge Liberals during the winter months but as soon as April came he could be found, although surrounded by soccer matches, practising his true love, cricket.

The sport was literally in his blood for his father was a cricket professional on the ground staff at Fenner's and had taken his first child, John Berry Hobbs, as a babe in arms to witness a match between the University and the Australians. The young lad's excitement had been such that one of the visiting team had commented "Better make a cricketer of that kid, old man." And so it proved.

It was at Jesus College that Jack developed his natural abilities, playing on a gravel pitch in front of the servants' quarters, the wicket a tennis post, the ball a tennis ball and his bat a cricket stump. It was here, too, that he batted in his first match when, aged 10, he joined with Jesus College choir-boys in a game.

The choirboys of St Matthew's Church made him the captain of their eleven when they took on the choristers of Trinity College and Jack hit his highest score to date, three runs. But he continued to watch the skills of the under-graduates in the nets at Jesus College and soon achieved an innings of 90 runs, ended only by a disputed lbw decision which prompted the paper to report it as 90 not out, an achievement that caused his father much delight.

By now he could be found on Parker's Piece practising before school — having woken at 6 am and spent half-an-hour walking there. He returned when the schoolday was finished and all day during the summer holidays.

Jack Hobbs probably paid more for his cricket than anybody else, since the charge for a match on a prepared pitch was one shilling (5p), each player paying one penny, except the captain who had to pay twopence. Jack was often the captain.

Having left the St Matthew's Church choir eleven he founded a team known as the Ivy Cricket Club and then joined those Cambridge Liberals (playing cricket as well as football). The year 1901 was the turning point in his career when both the Liberals and the Ainsworth clubs — with whom he had connections via a Bible class — wanted him in their side for the needle-match between them. In the event they tossed for his services, Ainsworth won and Jack notched up his first century.

Jack had a cricketer hero and used to walk to the public library to see his triumphs reported in national newspapers. When Cambridge cricketer Tom Hayward took his hundred wickets in one season of first class cricket young Master Hobbs was delighted; when he found himself facing Tom's bowling in a charity match and survived to make 26 not-out he was excited beyond measure.

There could be no doubt: Jack wanted to earn his living at the game, if only by working as a groundsman like his dad. In 1902 he achieved his first professional engagement at Bedford Grammar School — coaching schoolboys at the nets. John Hobbs senior died shortly afterwards, but not before he had seen his son make a fee of 10 shillings and a score of 119 in his first professional match on Royston Heath.

It was as the newspaper reported "a long and highly meritorious innings." It was just one of very many— 197 centuries in first-class cricket alone.

The career of John Berry Hobbs progressed from strength to strength; he played for England between 1907 and 1930 and for Surrey from leaving Cambridge in 1905 until his retirement in 1935. In 1924 he published "My Cricket Memories," a copy of which is housed in the Cambridgeshire Collection. It is a tangible reminder of a local lad who made good and overlooks an area he loved and which he described as "probably the finest and most famous public cricket ground in the world."

1986 03 27 – James Smith

JAMES Smith was a bit of a lad in his younger days. He was good at ploughing - he won first prize in the boys' class, but his passion was dancing and he frequently was out from early eve till early morning, making his way back to the small cottage in Narrow Lane Histon, just as the sun was rising.

But he did not care for Sunday School. He was strong-willed and not studious and the weekly trip to the Wesleyan Church was something of a bind, though he was to remember the various preachers he heard, including the famous Charles Spurgeon of Waterbeach.

However, it was in a room belonging to the Rose and Crown that he first heard Jacob Wisbey, who was preaching there as at the time the Baptist congregation had no chapel and what James heard changed his life, bringing him with pickaxe and shovel to help to clear the site on which the chapel was to be built and leading him to be baptised on Christmas Day, 1858.

The next year George Apthorpe invited the young man to leave the land and join him in his grocer's shop in Cambridge. James did his last harvest for Farmer Batterson and made the move. George Apthorpe was secretary of the Village Preachers' Association and soon his new assistant joined him as he travelled round the area conducting services in local chapels. Before long James was preaching himself and in January, 1862, he found himself in the Congregational Chapel at Reach delivering an address which left many of the congregation in tears.

While he travelled back to Cambridge many stayed behind struck by what the young man had said. They returned the following evening and at Newmarket the next day the word reached the ears of Edward Ball of Burwell — "we had that young man James Smith preaching at our chapel on Sunday evening and I never saw people like it before. Last night the chapel was full, and such a meet-ing! People were crying out and seeking for mercy. You must come over this weekend." That night many stayed on after the meeting and did not disband until two o'clock in the morning.

Edward Ball was im-pressed by what he heard of the new preacher and, when the people of Burwell decided to hold Sunday services in their British School, it was to James Smith that they looked for a minister. At first he declined, claiming that he had but few sermons, certainly not enough for the three-month session they wanted, but he was persuaded to change his mind and stayed nine months. At the outset many sneered, some even com-posed a song about them and paid a man to go through the village and sing it but, despite this, the congregation swelled, meetings continued well past mid-night and public baptisms were held in the river.

Four hundred and fifty people attended the public meeting held when James left Burwell to be trained for the ministry at Spurgeon's College in London. There he found difficul-ties, for he was no academic and was more at home in the pulpit than behind a desk studying Greek or Latin. To one used to fresh country air, the London fogs proved troublesome and he was forced to break his studies to return home for convalescence. There he met his future bride, although wedding plans had to be changed at the last minute as through an oversight they found they could not be married in the Histon chapel but had to transfer the service to Cottenham.

When he was appointed to minister at the Baptist chapel in Red Hill they to-gether learned the difficul-ties of building both a con-gregation and a new build-ing, and while the former were of good voice the acoustics of the chapel with an unpleasant echo made preaching difficult. After seven years they returned, in 1871, to Cam-bridgeshire to take charge of the second richest con-gregation in the county, that of Haddenham. It was one of the happiest — and yet the saddest — periods of his life.

The people were friendly and generous, the old chapel was frequently packed, the atmosphere becoming very close and hot, uncomfortable to preacher and people. Smith was concerned that the posts supporting the gallery were very thin — "I was afraid it might break down, and my wife was underneath." Those fears proved groundless but it was at this time that his mother died.

He travelled round to neighbouring chapels, always welcomed by Baptist friends — Camps, Sneesby, Everett, Yarrow and Few — before returning back to their nice comfortable Manse. Yet the view from the window looked over the adjacent nonconformist cemetery, there was no escape from reminder of death, and it was in that cemetery that James left his daughter Catherine, who died aged just eight years old from diphtheria. The minister was heart-broken — "I felt as if I could leap into the grave and bring her back again." He was to lose a second child, Minnie, in his next ministry at Leeds, whose smoke and noise and climate did not endear itself and where the new chapel blew down twice during construction. He stayed five years before moving down to Tunbridge Wells, where he ministered until his health gave way under the con-stant pressure of his work.

Gout, paralysis, bronchitis and pneumonia combining to reunite James with his two daughters in February, 1897. A tribute to the Histon boy was written by Mr T. Bell of Chesterton and Charles Spurgeon, his inspiration and teacher, contributed the preface. It remains a reminder of one man's con-tribution to Baptist worship in Cambridgeshire.

Samuel Newton's Diary

GUNFIRE echoed from the roof of King's College chapel in 1660 as the soldiers stationed there saluted the news of the proclamation of King Charles II. Samuel Newton jotted it down on a scrap of paper which he kept in his diary. It was his first entry in a journal that was to span over 50 years during which he witnessed many traumatic events.

He recorded gunfire again in June 1665 but this time it was the distant boom of canon as British and Dutch fleets battled off Harwich and he must have wondered if any of the men taken by press gang from Cambridge two months before had been involved. Some 80 had gone, including John Sparkes, the baker's son.

Samuel made his mark in Cambridge politics, becoming a councillor, Alderman and Mayor. As such he took part in much civic ceremonial, proclaimed Midsummer Fair and joined the Mayor and other councillors in the official trip from Mill Pool where they chartered three boats with nets to fish the river up as far as Bullen's. This must have been a potentially hazardous trip and he notes that official gowns were not worn, nor was the Mace carried with them. It was in the same stretch of water that one Alderman later lost his son, who drowned himself after being cheated out of £100 by a London gamester at a game of dice in the Red Heart inn, Petty Cury.

Samuel Newton was part of the official party who met various visiting dignitaries; he met the Duke of Tuscany in 1669, a young Dutch Prince a well countenanced man, a smooth and smeeger face and a handsome head of hayre of his own who paid a fleeting visit in 1670. He would have liked to have stayed longer as "he had a minde to see this Towne but his business was such as would permitt but a short stay." So reads the note about a certain William of Orange, whom Samuel was to meet again later.

In the meantime he met King Charles II and although the monarch did not get out of his coach when Mr Mayor Newton met him on Christ's Pieces in 1671 he did accept from Samuel's hands the gift of "100 twenty shilling peeces of broad gold in a crimson coullered velvet pouch" and commented approvingly of Hobson's conduit which "ran Claret wine when his Majestie passed by."

On February 7th, 1685 came news that the King was dead, James II was immediately proclaimed in eight places around Cambridge, Samuel himself reading the official proclamation, the Town Clerk repeating it more audibly.

James' support for Roman Catholicism was to prompt much disquiet and in December 1688 some people ransacked Cambridge for several nights, seeking Papists and arms, but all this was seen as only a foretaste of what was to come when news that a mob of from 5 to 6,000 Irishmen had "burnt Bedford and cutt all their throats there and they were coming on for Cambridge." Panic ensued.

"It being a rayny and darke night candles alight were sett upp in all windowes next the streetes and it was said that they were coming in at the Castle end, others said they were come in and cutting of throats, soe that the scare for the present was very great and very dismall" But it was all just rumour and calm eventually prevailed.

James was forced to abdicate and the young Prince William of Orange that Samuel had welcomed in 1670 was proclaimed king. Once more Samuel Newton was in the official party that waited on Christ's Pieces for the visit of their Sovereign in October 1689 though this time the present they had to offer was poor compared to the purse that had been handed to King Charles II.

The Corporation had sent their man down to London for a gift of a bason and ewer and had scraped together £50 for him to spend; in the event he could only find one worth £33, yet this was received well enough before the official party escorted the Royal coach to Trinity College where he dined before visiting King's College chapel and leaving again for Newmarket.

Samuel continued his diary until 1717, he was to see the death of King William, meet Queen Anne and hear the proclamation of King George I before he died aged 90 and was buried in St Edward's church.

The diary was published in 1890 and remains a fascinating record of civic life in Cambridge and events in the surrounding area.

1986 06 01 Singing the charms of Louth

AS holiday traffic jammed the motorways we headed off into the unknown.

Via Parson Drove (last home of the woad mills whose dye turned natives a frightening blue), through Gedney Hill and Holbeach Drove, wondering all the while where the traffic had gone to, then discovering it suddenly at Boston only to lose it again before Fishtoft.

On towards Grimsby, pausing to gather breath and gaze in wonder at the violent ascent beyond Scamblersby, and the excitement of Cadwell Park racing circuit on the approach to which motorbikes easily outnumbered family saloons, though neither were obtrusive.

With the spire of Louth Church beckoning it was time to turn off the main roads and down the private drive which led to the golf course and adjacent County House Hotel.

Had there been any hassle in the journey it would have immediately evaporated in an atmosphere of calm, in the well-padded lounge and magnificent conservatory whose outside tables looked south over rolling countryside with not a house in sight.

It was countryside waiting to be explored, especially with a beautiful village just a stroll away on the edge of which was an attractive ford and a most attractive thatched pub. But this was a Bank Holiday weekend. Though there places to sit there was no food as the kitchens were unable to cope with the waiting list — a situation echoed in the next pub, where staff waited for the butcher we saw gossiping to a customer a few houses down. By the time we had retraced our footsteps the queue had melted away and the wait was worthwhile.

Finally unpacked we discovered to our horror a new sports and swimming complex, unexpected when trunks were left behind. In Louth courteous shopkeepers combined to ensure the oversight was remedied.

Courtesy and friendliness dominated our impressions of our neighbours in Lincolnshire. People with time to talk and a willingness to do so. To describe the events of a wartime night when dozens of incendiary bombs had destroyed the elegant mansion in the rebuilt wing of which we now temporarily resided — the result not of enemy action but of a returning bomber jettisoning its cargo before landing at one of the adjacent airfields.

By chance, a day or two later, I sat beside one who had flown and fought from that very strip. I sang the charms of Louth which he could not echo. Who would choose to visit a dreary landscape full of flat fields of sugar beet. I protested that it had been a green and lambing landscape — it must be just a change in agriculture. And the rolling hills of these Lincolnshire wolds, so reminiscent of more distant Downs or Dales, were they the result of more misplaced bombs or some magic woven by Lincolnshire folk. If so it worked,

Kenwick Park Hotel, Louth, where we stayed, is part of the Best Western Hotels group and offers breaks throughout the year.

Rev William Cole

THE Rev William Cole was house-hunting. He had taken the living at Bletchley but now his time there was nearly up and he hankered to move back to Cambridge-shire.

He already had some properties there in the form of a farmhouse at Frog Hall, Haddenham. But in February 1767 this had been flooded when the river breached at Over and his servant who had visited it three months later reported the land was still awash with water two feet deep. No, Haddenham might suit frogs but a clergyman needed better accommodation.

William had kept in touch with houses by scanning the "Cambridge Chronicle" weekly and had numerous friends whose help he could call upon when seeking suitable properties. The Rev Masters of Landbeach informed him of houses at Waterbeach, Gamlingay or Girton, or there was a house and land on the market at Duxford for £250. Cole wrote to Mr Huddleston of Sawston Hall for further details. The message came back that the house was ruinous. However, there were properties in Shelford or Ickleton and the White Hart Inn at Ely was being converted into a gentleman's house.

Faced with so much advice William decided to see for himself, but it was not until Monday, June 15, 1767 that he set off — only to find the stagecoach overbooked and had to hire a private post chaise as far as London. Here he bought himself a new coach for £50 and in this finally arrived at Sawston at two o'clock on the Wednesday afternoon. Huddleston guided him around the properties but they were not at all suitable

Cole moved on to visit Mr Masters at Landbeach and together they went to look at the vicarage at Waterbeach. He found it "extremely small, inconvenient and wretched" but thought it would suit him well. His friend urged him against it, but William was adamant. The price was right, he could have the care of the church and hire some other land for £6, coals and firing was cheap and his beloved Cambridge near. His mind was made up and he returned to Bletchley to make arrangements for moving.

The heavy goods would go by water. Two carts would take them to Bedford where Mr Thead would take them down the Ouse to Earith, then on to the Old West River, down to the Cam and up to Waterbeach. But by the time they arrived Cole had agreed on a different house. "Much more convenient and with stables." Masters had told him and Cole took his word.

On Tuesday, August 11 he set off in his coach with a full load of china plates. The journey was tiring, his horse was ill and had to be rested frequently. It was eight the following evening when he got to Landbeach and next morning before he glimpsed his new property. He was horrified. It "was much out of repair and a shocking place." The kitchen needed tiling, a wall had to be built, partitions installed, decorating to be done ... when the deal fell through Cole was relieved and made arrangements for work to begin on his original choice, the Vicarage.

Back he went to Bletchley. Back he came on November 20 to find the house still incomplete. He moved in on December 1 amid much muddle, often having to journey to Cambridge for odds and ends of material. He squabbled with Masters, who was quick to tell him he had always said Cole should never have bought the place anyway.

By Christmas he was writing to his friends in Buckinghamshire. His bedroom was still "filled up with boxes, clothes and all sorts of litter for the two or three others had neither doors nor ceilings when I came, not even a staircase to get up to the garrets, though I had been made to believe that every thing was ready for me."

He had other problems: "I have a sort of hall where I cannot sit with the door shut because of the smook, which is also the case of every room in the house." He was constantly "running out of the smoky parlour for fresh air into the hall,"

What was worse "the grief of grief is yet behind: the Parish swarms with Methodists: my 2 neighbours on each side of me are such, and opposite to me the same: and indeed, look which way I will, the same heresy stares me in the Face. It is probable I shall make no long Stay and where I heartily wish I had never set foot ... these are penances due for my sins and I hope they will be accepted as such."

But despite it all Cole still loved Cambridgeshire^ ... "Wild Fowl such as Ducks, Teal. Snipes etc are here in their element and perfection: and Fish of every sort of the River kind I never tasted better..."

He endured his penance for two years, then moved — more happily — to Milton where he died in December 1782 having secured his place as the county's greatest historian.

John O'Donoghue

It was 1943 and John O'Donoghue was a foreigner in a strange land.

Like others he had been made to strip and bathe before being led like cattle to a canteen where they were given mugs of evil-tasting tea and terrible, sour meat pies. Some said they contained jackdaw-meat and John believed them.

By the time his train finally lurched into the station he had been heartily sick and on arrival at the camp while others had reported to the police, he was fit for nothing but to collapse on his bunk and stare at the corrugated iron roof of the Nissen hut until sleep overcame him.

Next morning as he ate the few pieces of bacon and sausage that were all the ration afforded he tried to make some sense of the babble of voices around him, all speaking the same language but in accents that varied from Scottish and Welsh to the almost incomprehensible Cockney as well as the more familiar Irish brogue such as his own.

For John had left County Kerry not to fight for his country but to earn enough to save himself starving in a workhouse at home. Now he was here, just a few miles from Cambridge, to work on the airfield they were constructing across the Witchford fields.

The transport took them into Ely and then out along the Cambridge road to the gates of the camp where in hard frost and thickening fog they waited to be assigned to their tasks. John was allotted to the gang working the giant cement mixer, shovelling stones and sand into the machine until his arms ached and he felt fit to drop. This was no work for a 43-year-old. Nor did he find pushing the heavy barrow piled high with concrete across narrow planks over deep and wide ditches any more to his liking, and when he tried carrying the bags of cement dust it got into his eyes as it did into every scratch on his hands. By the end of three days he had had enough and said so in no uncertain manner. He was transferred to a gang of bricklayers but was not prepared to be bullied by the small foreman there and stalked off again.

Surely somewhere in the mass of equipment that stretched across the site there must be some-thing suitable for one such as he. Fortune smiled on him. He was offered a post in the canteen, cleaning ranges, lighting fires, fill-ing the big urns with water, dusting and sweeping. At lunch time he helped to serve the plates of food. Afterwards he had his fill from what was left.

It would have been an ideal world were it not for Miss Bossy-Boots — a local girl — who objected to his friends visiting the kitchen while encouraging others who were in a position to supply her with fully-fashioned stockings.

In truth John found the locals most reserved. They would not respond to his Irish chat. Children ran indoors when he passed. It would have been most lonely were it not for the group of his cousins who were quartered just across the fen working on Mepal airfield, and for the friendship he struck up with a local boy — an educated lad who attended Soham Grammar School.

For was not John him-self an educated man? He journeyed to Cambridge to look at the colleges and stop undergraduates on the streets for a discus-sion, and he attended the King's School in Ely. Or rather he visited it twice. Once he was merely wandering round when he spotted an open door and, at the top of the stairs, a classroom with books — and John loved books. One caught his eye. It was 'The Pilgrim's Pro-gress' and was illustrated with nice, coloured pic-tures; for a while he read then noticed the piano in the corner and taking a seat played, with one hand, "The wearing of the green," a sort of musical protest against the strange ways of Fenland folk. Later he returned to the same room, pushed open the door and was amazed when a class of boys rose to their feet as he walked in.

"What a show of honour for a mere Irish peasant," he mused. The headmaster whose class he had interrupted was however quite ada-mant — John should really not be wandering around the school, he must leave. John wrote to apologise. A reply invited him for a chat, as a result of which he was allowed to borrow the book he had set his heart on reading.

Further books came following a bike ride to March to visit the county librarian at her home, and there were more to be seen in the Ely bookshop. John was especially in-terested in geography. He bought a map to show where Witchford was, he asked directions and de-tails from passers-by, and he received a visit from the constabulary anxious to discover just why such a one as he was making all the inquiries about the location of newly con-structed airfields in wartime Britain.

When his ability to write resulted in a transfer from the kitchen to the camp office John was delighted. He was less pleased when he found that he had to add up columns of figures, and still sadder when he found himself outside again labouring. He was one of a large gang sweeping the newly constructed runways, singing songs of old Ire-land while the large Lancaster bombers were flying in to take their places in the big black hangars that he had helped to construct, when the announcement came that his labour was no longer required.

The officious staff at the Ely Labour Exchange had nothing at all suitable for an Irish labourer, yet if he went home there would be nothing to do except work in the bogs, digging peat to replace the coal that was no longer available.

Rumour had it that there was work at Handley Page's factory at Cricklewood, so with not too much regret John O'Donoghue once more boarded the train at Ely station, got his last glimpse of Cambridge as he passed through and went off to seek his for-tune elsewhere.

Postcard discovery not black and white – Mike Petty

James Gillham from ... [james@jgphotos.co.uk] has some across some old negatives, dating back to the 1960s which provide something of a mystery. There are three separate boxes, one labelled 'Rowell – Exning', another just 'Godmanchester' and the third 'Rev Ruston – Cambridge'

The first contains envelopes of 6x4 inch negatives and prints initialled LRC. They show Landwade Road, St Martin's Close, the Church, Oxford Street and Glanelly Old People's Home, all in Exning. They were produced as postcards, but it is hard to believe they enjoyed great commercial success. [SCAN NEGS OF ST MARTIN'S CLOSE AND GLANELLY OLD PEOPLES HOME]

The Godmanchester box has rather more negatives of the church, Causeway, War Memorial, Cambridge Street, Post Street, Black Bull and River, amongst others. Many have the initials LRB followed by a number [SCAN NEGS OF THE BLACK BULL, POST STREET AND COMPOSITE 'GREETINGS' CARD]

The Cambridge box contains negatives of Holy Sepulchre Church, together with some postcard-sized prints. The envelopes containing the negatives are stamped 'E.A. Sweetman & Sons Ltd, 'Sunshine Works', Tunbridge Wells, Kent' but there is correspondence from the Revd C.M. Ruston of Jesus Lane, Cambridge dated 8th September 1965. addressed to the Automatic Photo Printing Company. From this it seems that the Company is to produce postcard from the negatives: "please go ahead and print 1000 for the moment, as soon as possible. When the new season for visitors is a bit nearer I shall be able to order this card and another". A bit later the Rev Ruston says: "It will be best if you keep the negatives from which you work". [SCAN OF TWO VIEWS OF HOLY SEPULCHRE]

Another loose envelope has the heading 'Automatic Photo Printing Co.Ltd, The Photo Trade Printers and Finishers', Walton, Peterborough' which might suggest that the two firms were linked.

Does any of this ring any bell with you, or do the pictures themselves jog special memories of the place you called home?

James doesn't want the pictures to be dumped and is planning to deposit them in the Cambridgeshire Collection at Lion Yard Library

Wheeler Street, by Mike Petty

Wheeler Street is not one of Cambridge's most distinguished thoroughfares but it houses two of the City's most important buildings. One is the magnificent domed room originally constructed as the home for the Free Library which houses the Tourist Bureau. [SCAN LIBRARY INTERIOR 1930S, NOW TOURIST BUREAU]. It was nearly destroyed in 1904 by a serious fire that devastated the adjacent corn merchants premises on Peas Hill, its dome peering above the burnt-out rafters. [SCAN PEAS 1 – PEAS HILL FOLLOWING FIRE 1904]The wrecked buildings were removed, together with the premises of Mr Meech the tobacconist and Mr Hills' printshop, and replaced by offices later used as a children's' library and newspaper reading room before they moved to the new Central Library in Lion Yard. [SCAN T2017 – WHEELER STREET 1950S]

In Victorian times it was a bustling street; every Saturday the area was a vast outdoor display. Mr Johnson, the cooper put out his hogshead, pipes, tubs and casks on the pavement opposite the shop for sale. In Parson's Court – or Ann's Yard as was then called –Mr Summer a cabinet maker displayed tables, chairs and furniture, Mr Clayton hung fish outside his shop, together with hares and rabbits on sticks and there were vendors of sweetmeats and walnuts with trays hung around their necks. [SCAN 6923 – PARSONS COURT, WHEELER STREET 1875]

But it was not an place to linger for at one end were the fish sellers on Peas Hill, about 20 stalls some half on the road and half on the pavement. There were other commodities too – earthenware, corn and shoes - but the main thing was the fish of all sorts, from sea and fen. And added to the smell of fish was the stench from piles of bullock and calf skins collected from the butchers and piled up in a heap in Butcher Row until there were enough to be carted away to Thomas Evans works at Sawston. People complained to the Council who said nothing could be done, as it was part of the Market.

The sale of corn had always been an important part of the local economy and until 1842 was conducted between Market Street and Rose Crescent. But then a purpose-built Corn Exchange had been constructed on the corner of Downing Street and what was once called Slaughter House Lane, now Corn Exchange Street.

Seven years later the Market Hill area was devastated by a fire and when the ashes had cooled the debate began on how best to make use of this new opportunity to redevelop the commercial centre of the town. The present Market Square is one result of the deliberation. A second consequence was more slowly realised and necessitated much debate & argument before in 1876 a New Corn Exchange was opened in Wheeler Street.

The question as to what was to be done with the Old building occupied many minds. For a while it was used as an indoor market the Cambridge Arcade - then Ernie Hayward, an enterprising local concert promoter, converted it into a variety music hall and enjoyed considerable success. But the long frost between December 1894 and March 1895 was its downfall. The cold weather prompted another enterprising businessman, Mr Bartholomew, to install floodlights so people could skate on a specially flooded area of Grantchester Meadows through the hours of darkness. This combination of a popular pastime and the novelty of floodlighting caught the imagination of those patrons who ought to have been flocking into the Arcade Music Hall. Even the prospect of a Marie Lloyd concert was insufficient attraction and the theatre closed shortly before the thaw came. From 1895 to 1914 it was used as a cycle repair shop, subsequently it became one of the many garages which have now disappeared from central Cambridge. Then in January 1951 came demolition. The site was more useful for car parking than the old, listed, building until in January 1989 work started on the construction of a new Hotel complex in its place. [SCAN 6817 THE OLD CORN EXCHANGE, DOWNING STREET]

Meanwhile the New Corn Exchange had also seen a change in fortunes. It had started controversially, with legal appeals to the House of Lords over the council's authority to construct it, then there had been a competition for its design with various architects submitting proposals to be evaluated by Alfred Waterhouse, himself responsible for many college buildings. Once Richard Reynolds Rowe's design was agreed then the construction began, clearing away a large area of the town centre and changing Wheeler Street forever. [FIND LIBRARY PIC OF NEW CORN EXCHANGE]

The new building started life tumultuously in November 1875 with what has become known as the 'Death Riots'. The unfortunately-named John Death, then Mayor of Cambridge, was also owner of a livery stable. As he drove in his robes and chain to open the new Corn Exchange various undergraduates called out "Whoa Mayor", but he carried on to do his civic duty.

Then two days later an inaugural concert was held, arranged by the Cambridge Musical Society. The building was packed, with the seats reserved for dignitaries and members of the University being separated from the masses by a barricade. But when the Mayor and Corporation attempted to reach them they were jostled and had to force their way through.

During the singing of the National Anthem certain undergraduates began to yell and stamp and before long the concert was interrupted again. Twice the Mayor appealed to the students to keep order, but to no avail. Women fainted, children screamed and many of those standing rushed the barrier and pushed people out of their seats. Goaded to anger the Mayor sent for a body of police to keep order and seven arrests were made. This led the undergraduates to attempt to "rescue" their colleagues and some of the police were roughly handled. Under such circumstances the concert had to be abandoned.

The next day undergraduates burnt effigies of the Mayor, crying “Death! ... Death!” and after the arrested men were heavily fined a mob marched on the Mayor’s house, which stood on the site of the present Wesley church. Here police were able to prevent the house being broken into, though stones smashed the windows and the situation seemed out of control.

Then onto the scene strode “Black Morgan”, tutor of Jesus College, a popular figure in the University. As the crowds parted before him he climbed on a wall and addressed the crowds. “You young scoundrels, you ought to be ashamed of yourselves frightening a lot of old women out of their wits”. He told the multitude that he would be quite blind for five minutes, but no longer and during that period the crowd dispersed with three cheers for the Tutor of Jesus. No further action was taken by proctor or police.

In the New Corn Exchange corn merchants and farmers conducting their business were soon joined by a statue of Jonas Webb, a renowned breeder of sheep, which was moved from the Market Hill. [SCAN 5327 CORN MERCHANTS 1920S, SCAN 8561 – CORN MERCHANTS, SCAN 8574 – JONAS WEBB, AS DRAWN BY LEWIS TODD 1950S] But they did not have the building to themselves

From the turn of the century both cycle manufacturers and makers of motor cycles and motor cars found its space invaluable and it here that Hon C.S. Rolls first rode a motor cycle before going on to found his car company. By 1903 the Cambridge Corn Exchange exhibition of cycles and motors had become an annual event. The paper commented: “Motors and motor cycles are as yet in their infancy and each year sees great strides taken towards perfection. There are on view some fine, up-to-date specimens of motor cars”. Later motor shows saw vehicles approaching modern standards [SCAN 7375 A MOTOR SHOW C1905, SCAN T2333 A MOTOR SHOW 1965]

There were other trade shows such as the Industrial Trades Exhibition of Household Requirements in July 1926 where Messrs Robert Sayle displayed armchairs and luxurious baby carriages and Miller & Sons had pianos and gramophones. Then in 1948 Pye of Cambridge gave the world’s first demonstration of closed-circuit television before coming back to the building to install television sets to allow the lucky few to watch the Coronation

But it was also a sporting venue with wrestling in 1898 between the Middleweight Champion of England and the champion of Bulgaria – a match nobody will now remember. But in June 1978 it was ‘Giant Haystacks’ who towered above every other wrestler in the British ring at 6ft 11in and 32 stone who stepped into the Corn Exchange ring to pit his strength against Mike Marino. “The bout looked over when Haystacks body-slammed Marino to the canvas and, with a contemptuous glance, headed for the dressing room. But incredibly Marino managed to stagger to his feet before the count ended and Haystacks could not lumber back into the ring in time”, the News reported. [FIND NEWS PIC OF WRESTLING]

Ju Jitsu arrived in 1922 when Harry Hunter of Broadstairs, England's greatest exponent, and Mr W. Saddington, a local expert in the art gave a demonstration. Various throws and locks were shown but the one which interested the audience was that of throwing and rendering an opponent unconscious in a few seconds, before instantly reviving him by Katsu, the Japanese method of restoration. Rather more peaceful were the table-tennis tournaments, held for the first time in 1902 [SCAN 7075 TABLE TENNIS 1962]and continued throughout the century, whilst roller skaters flocked there in the 1960s. [SCAN ROLLER – ROLLER SKATERS OCTOBER 1974]

The Corn Exchange was also a place for political meetings. Winston Churchill addressed a gathering of undergraduates in 1939, [SCAN T97 – WINSTON CHURCHILL IN CORN EXCHANGE] Harold Wilson was heckled in April 1975 but overcame the building’s notorious acoustics to win a standing ovation from almost 1,000 people. His main topic was the Common Market. He then went through a list of election promises and while harassed by the hecklers, who had paid 15p to get into the meeting, spelled out how each promise had been fulfilled.

When politics gave way to war it was here that Home Guard's rifles were assembled and it became a canteen and social centre for thousands of Servicemen and women, during the dark days of war.

In happier time the Campaign for Real Ale made it the venue for several of their beer festivals, it was home to boy scout rallies [SCAN T2542 BOY SCOUT MEETING INSIDE CORN EXCHANGE c.1920] old people's teas, bingo sessions and celebrations of all sorts. [FIND NEWS PHOTO OF BEER FESTIVAL]

It could also be converted into a dance hall. This was an expensive undertaking as the News commented in 1904: "Few realise the lavish expenditure on the May Balls held in Cambridge Corn Exchange. After the corn merchants have vacated the building on the Saturday evening a small army of workmen take possession. They labour until midnight when the advent of the Sabbath and the strict rules governing municipal buildings shut them out for 24 hours. With the first hour of Monday morning they re-enter and by eight that evening the place is transformed into an artistic ballroom through which not a vestige of the prosaic Corn Exchange is seen. What of the cost? There is not less than £2,000 worth of goods in the ball room; add to that the cost of utilising the Guildhall as a supper room and include the china and plates for the supper and you have a total of some thousands of pounds to provide our moneyed visitors with an evening's entertainment". [PERHAPS FIND PIC OF BALL] Sometimes a bridge was built to link the Exchange to the Guildhall. [SCAN 6840 – CAPTIONED PICTURE OF TESTING STRENGTH OF A BRIDGE ACROSS WHEELER STREET LINKING THE CORN EXCHANGE AND THE GUILDHALL]

But the building was home too to music. Classical concerts and rock bands each performed in its cavernous interior though there were problems in 1974 when both the Drifters and the Ronettes failed to turn up for concert dates, disappointing thousands of fans. When The Stranglers appeared in 1977 it was the fans like Rat Rancid, with his mate Garry Gangrene, from King's Lynn who attracted the attention of the reports. "Here were some punks that looked every bit as vile as the ones we've all read about. They were horrible. I think it was the safety pins through the cheeks that made me feel slightly sick, but it may just have been the chains through their noses. They snarled and leered while my colleague, Mike Manni, took their pictures. Then Rat put down his can of Party Seven and scribbled his address. Could we send some prints. "To Rat Rancid", I asked. "Oh, no", he gasped. "My mum wouldn't like that".

Publicans were alarmed by the prospect of trouble. In 1978 one complained "It was absolutely dreadful: all the London trains were full of punk rockers coming to Cambridge because all the other towns have banned them. They spit and strip on stage". [PERHAPS NEWS PHOTOS OF CONCERT]

The Corn Exchange was home to a variety of events, but it was by no means an ideal venue for anything. After a £8,000 new corn market was established in 1966 thoughts turned with greater emphasis on just what to do with it. Throughout the 1970s the search was on for a source of funding to allow the transformation of the old building into a concert hall of potentially international stature. Mayor Jack Warren started negotiations with oil sheikhs and millionaire recluse David Robinson, who having funded a new college was now looking to make a contribution towards the city itself. But he found the Corn Exchange too ugly and the cost too high. Mecca became involved for a while, but things move at a leisurely pace in Cambridge. Finally in November 1986 the Corn Exchange Concert Hall actually opened and the building itself started a new phase in its most varied career. [FIND MODERN PICTURE AFTER CONVERSION]

When a semi cost less than £15,000 by Mike Petty

THE SAME OLD NEWS

The trouble with Cambridge is that houses prices are so expensive that ordinary folk can't afford to live here – they need to move out into the surrounding countryside. That's why there are so many bicycles – people have to bike in to their work. That's what they said in September 1910

But one doesn't have to go back that far.

Cambridge house prices in the Romsey Town area have rocketed over the last 15 years, soaring up 530% PER CENT, the News reported in July 1977. Back in 1962 a terraced house off Mill Road, two up, two down would have cost about £1,350. It was now a massive £8,500.

But it really depended on where you bought. If you had invested £3,000 in a three-bedroomed semi in Perne Road back in 1962 your property would only have risen to £14,000

Pauline Hunt analysed the problem in the News of 21st July 1977. : “The sudden jump in house prices at the beginning of the 1970s meant that the small artisan terraced houses were the only ones within the financial reach of a great number of young couples buying their first home. So an area which had previously had a largely elderly population suddenly saw an influx of young people.”

And ‘green issues’ also featured: more and more people had rejected the car and wanted to be within walking distance of the city centre. Streets on the edge of the Kite area such as Willow Walk, Earl Street and Victoria Street were increasingly becoming sought after.

More central area such as Portugal Place had seen prices tripling to £30,000. But there were some problems about the Riverside area where the Gasworks dominated the view and a house on the edge of the Cam could be had for around £10,000

But before you get too dewy-eyed about the good old days, just try and remember what you were earning in those distant days of 27 years ago.

Do you have memories of struggling to get on the housing ladder, or is it only today's generation that have problems affording homes?

“OUR TIME” 2004 04

Cambridge before the grand design – Mike Petty

With the impending Grand Arcade development the area of central Cambridge between Petty Cury and Downing Street is poised to undergo yet another transformation.

When I started work in Cambridge in the mid 1960s the south side of Petty Cury was not an olde-worlde area of quaint architecture. It was a warren of somewhat decrepit small lanes such as Alexandra Street, Falcon Yard, St Tibbs Row and Post Office Terrace which had been largely rebuilt during Victorian times.

But it also featured a number of buildings erected by the one-time Cambridge Borough Surveyor, Richard Rowe.

They included the Young Men's Christian Association that I never entered – did you? It opened in 1871 and included a lecture room known as the Alexandra Hall that showed some of the first 'animated pictures' seen in Cambridge and later hosted dances. It was replaced by a new building opening in 1974

There was the massive Vicar's Buildings built in 1871 to house the very poor squeezed out of their homes by slum clearance and college expansion. But these 'model dwellings' were too expensive for ordinary folk and instead part of the building became a printing works. Did you use their services, or even work there?

It was Rowe too who designed the Corn Exchange though by the 1960s it had long since ceased to have an agricultural role and the statue of Babraham farmer Jonas Webb instead looked down on youngsters roller skating. As I worked in the Reference Library across Wheeler Street the studious calm would often be shattered by pop groups winding up their amplifiers in preparation for an evening concert. I never attended any of these either.

Nor did I patronise the Red Cow, another example of Rowe's skills; it was scheduled to be ripped down but was reprieved and rebuilt at the last moment so as to soften the impact of the new Lion Yard redevelopment.

There was no such reprieve for the buildings that lined Corn Exchange Street. I did once dare to enter the Masonic Hall and take an out-of-focus snap of its ornate ceiling. This was one of a series of photographs that I would take in the morning before the library opened, trying to capture something of the area that was due to be razed. These I added to the mass of other illustrations stored in the little, windowless room that housed the Library's collection of Cambridge material.

Occasionally I saw other people doing the same thing, and as the years passed several of those pictures were handed in to the Cambridgeshire Collection when it moved to a new department on the third floor of the Lion Yard Library. Sometimes it seemed that we must almost have been standing on the same corner at the same time!

But of course there were professional photographers with proper cameras who were also recording the scene. Their pictures appeared in the Cambridge News as it was in those days - and are still filed in the archives of the CEN at Milton.

This selection were taken on 7th March 1972; some will be familiar, others have not before been published.

Perhaps the one that will cause the most puzzlement is the one that shows Sketchley's the cleaners. It really is the corner of Petty Cury and Guildhall Place and if you study the line of buildings going down the street you will spot the gap where the Lion Hotel has already been demolished, a forerunner of the total clearance that was soon to follow.

If any of this rings a bell, then let me know.

And if you too took your Kodak down St Tibbs Row and have black and white snaps, or – better still – colour slides, of how Cambridge used to be in the 60s or 70s then take this opportunity to share them with the rest of us. Who knows I might be on one of them!

The most famous were Ramsey and Muspratt, whose portraits of the great, good, infamous and ordinary folk of Cambridge included the spies, Burgess, Philby and Mclean. Their negatives, together with thousands of glass plates taken since the 1860s are amongst the material housed in the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library where copies can still be ordered.

One of the finest Edwardian buildings in Cambridge it was to be razed to the ground in June, three months after these pictures were taken. By co-incidence a more modern telephone exchange was constructed in Post Office Terrance in 1957.

Our Time 2004 05 - Fitzroy Street –

Our Time April 2004

Fitzroy Street, by Mike Petty

Fitzroy Street in the 1960s was very different from the thriving shopping area it now is.

Forty years ago the News sent Erica Dimock to chat to the shopkeepers and householders in Fitzroy Street. She found it an area in the process of regaining some of its former importance. Parking and traffic difficulties in the town centre and the building of modern stores was attracting many people to its shopping centre.

“In the past it was a rather poor shopping area with many of the stores dealing in cheap, imported goods. But in recent years the situation has changed and most of the traders take great pride in what they have to sell.” she reported.

A modern range of shops including a branch of Miller’s music shop, Woolworth’s, Freeman Hardy and Willis’ shoe shop, Cramphorn’s the corn merchant and even a Chinese restaurant had moved in. It included a Fine Fare supermarket with a Food Fare just across the road and although some traders felt they were spoiling the atmosphere of the street others welcomed the new approach as being in keeping with modern trends. Yet others felt it would be better to erase the whole area and redevelop it all at one time. [PIC SUP 0158 598 – THE NEW SHOPS WHICH SOME THOUGHT WERE ‘SPOILING THE ATMOSPHERE’]

The main shopping area was dominated by the old established shop of Laurie and McConnal. Their original building had been razed to the ground in a great fire in 1903 but undaunted by the tragedy a new store was soon being constructed. As the century progressed the firm expanded into neighbouring premises until by 1964 it dominated the north side of the street. The shop sold everything from clothing to furnishing, fabric, hardware, china and gardening implements and then employed some 130 people. Were you one of them?

Topping the roofline was a bandstand from which Christmas shoppers were entertained with carols played by members of a brass band. Robert Austin, president of the Brass Band Association, was among them and recalled: “The view was a very busy market place in those days, with shops open until nine, 10 and 11 p.m. on Saturdays. Each side of the street was lined with costers’ barrows and both footpaths and the whole roadway chock a block with pedestrians. The sight of hundreds of white faces staring up at the bandstand was one really worth seeing” [PIC SUP 0158 608 – LOOKING DOWN FITZROY STREET TOWARDS NEW SQUARE]

Then during the summer customers could take advantage of a roof garden. Mr Austin recalled: “It was most pleasant up there. Teas and ices were served to patrons ensconced in deck or cane chairs at small tables surmounted by large striped parasols. Tubs of flowers dotted the roof and there was a really wonderful view of Cambridge and the surrounding country”. [SCAN OF VIEW FROM ROOF]

On the corner of Fair Street was Peaks Furnishers, a family business that had started in Fitzroy Street in 1936 and by then had another shop in the newly-opened Bradwell’s Court. Another family business was that of Claude Scott which was set up in 1957 to specialise in motor cycles and scooter spares and equipment but then expanded to motor cars.

Nearer East Road was A.C. Lovelock, a fruiterer who had traded in the street since the 1920s and knew first hand the problems of the area: “At one time it was very busy but then with the development of the centre of Cambridge much of our trade out here declined. Now things are just beginning to improve again, largely due to the erection of the new shops such as Woolworth's and the Fine Fare supermarket".

An older-established shop, W. Thompson, household furnishing store on the corner of City Road was alongside a brand new one, Michael Collins, a fabric and carpeting shop specialising in slightly unusual designs that would appeal to young people. "I am amazed by the different kinds of people who come shopping here", he told Erica. Were you one? [PIC SUP 0158 605 – THOMPSON'S STORE ON CORNER OF CITY ROAD WITH EDEN BAPTIST CHAPEL – WHICH STILL STANDS AT THE ENTRANCE TO THE GRAFTON CENTRE]

Elsewhere Boots the chemists and Page's cake shop were either side of Frederick Hopkins' wet, dry and fried fish shop, founded by his father in 1899, and as proof of the prosperity of the area the Westminster Bank had erected a modern new bank. [PIC SUP 0158 606 – MR F.C. HOPKINS WHO FOLLOWED IN HIS FATHER'S FOOTSTEPS WHEN HE TOOK A FISH SHOP IN FIRZROY STREET]

But just a little further along, after the junction with Burleigh Street, the atmosphere of the street changed. Here the street was narrower, and the dates of much of the buildings more apparent. Many had already been demolished in readiness for a general redevelopment of the area, which was not in the event to come for another 20 years. "Meanwhile, this interim state gives the east end of the street a depressing uncared-for appearance which local residents are tolerating with surprising cheerfulness. But there are not many people living in Fitzroy Street now. Rows of cottages have been taken down and few can call themselves neighbours", Erica commented. "Those who remain say they would not like to live anywhere else, 'It's the whole atmosphere and feeling of the place. We've always lived here and always want to' [PIC SUP 0158 603 – THE CORNER OF FIZROY STREET AND NELSON STRTEET, LOOKING TOWARDS EAST ROAD. PIC SUP 0158 602 – THE DERELICT EAST ROAD END OF FITZROY STREET]

One reminder of the street's humble origins was the old Working Men's Club and Institute on the corner of East Road but the dairy that used to stand on the corner of Wellington Street had gone. The Old English Gentleman public house had kept up to date with wallpaper bearing the faces and signature of The Beatles and a juke box playing their music attracted a considerable number of people from all over Cambridge to its weekend music evenings. Many of the other pubs in the area had already closed and the only competition was the Ancient Druids, a short distance away. But trade there was slow: "There is nothing for people to come here for", the landlord complained. [PIC SUP 0158 607 – OLD ENGLISH GENTLEMAN LOOKING BACK TOWARDS THE BUSTLING PART OF THE STREET. Between the two pubs was the agricultural and horticultural engineering business of Choppen and Company, selling lawn mowers and hedge cutters in an area devoid of either. [PIC SUP 0158 604 – CHOPPENS SOLD LAWN MOWERS BUT THE ONLY GREENERY WAS WEEDS ON DERELICT SITES]

Opposite lived Ted Whitehead, a member of the well-known family of wholesale and retail fruiterers and nearby Mr G.A. Gilbert had run his butcher's business since the 1920s. He was unique in Cambridge in that cattle were still brought alive to his premises and killed in a private slaughterhouse at the rear of the shop, so that his customers could always be sure their meat was absolutely fresh. Nearby Mr H. Bull's farm shop had been for many years supplied from a family firm at Waterbeach whilst Naylor's green grocery was once a well-known local bacon shop. [PIC SUP 0158 596 – MR G.A. GILBERT AND HIS SON SERVING CUSTOMERS IN THEIR BUTCHERS SHOP]

It was not only meat that was fresh; there was Legge's bakers' shop where the cakes were home-made and further along T. Page specialised in homemade pastries and confectionery; both had traded for more than a century.

But perhaps the shop best remembered in the top end of the street was Mrs Verlander's hardware and grocery shop, well known for the copper kettle hanging outside. They pioneered a form of the trading stamps – which were all the rage in 1964 – by giving away coupons with the soap they sold which could be exchanged for free gifts. "People tend to forget this stretch of Fitzroy Street exists", she lamented but Mr L.J. Wright who had a green grocery shop nearby put it another way: "The area is being knocked flat so there are no local customers left to pop in each day and do their shopping" [PIC SUP 0158 597 – MRS VERLANDER OUTSIDE HER LITTLE KETTLE HARDWARE SHOP. PIC SUP 0158 600 – MRS VERLANDER INSIDE HER SHOP WITH A LITTLE KETTLE]

The debate on the redevelopment of the Fitzroy Street area was to drag on and on while councils debated and people protested. In the end the new Grafton Centre was opened by the Queen in 1984.

Peter Hall from Histon writes:

My wife has just bought the second issue of Our Time and I was fascinated to read the article on Fitzroy Street in the 1960's. I thought that you might find some of the following of interest by going back it bit further in time.:

I was born in 1929 at the Fitzroy Arms where my grandparents Reuben and Kate Elsdon became tenants in 1914. They were assisted by my parents Wally and Nellie Hall who joined them after the general strike in 1926. Then after the death of Kate in 1936 and Reuben in 1947 Wally and Nellie took on the tenancy until they retired in 1954.

The Fitzroy, with it's large clubroom was home to a number of clubs including The Albion Fishing Club, The Preservation Fishing Society, The Ancient Order of Foresters, The Royal Antedeluvian Order of Buffaloes and The Home Guard Rifle Club, later to be known as The Gogs Rifle Club.

Amongst the shops on the north side of Fitzroy Street were Peaks, Frank Suttle the tailor who also had a factory in Eden Street. During the war they made thousands of military badges, stripes etc.for all of the armed forces.

Then came more of Peaks shops, then Lauries and Sturtons which in time changed to Pauley's. This was the forerunner of Willow Wholesale for whom I worked as a paint rep in the early 60's. Next came Pages where (before the war) children would queue early on a Monday morning to buy buns and cakes left over from Saturday. Then there was Freddie Hopkins, Boots, Dewhurst & Norman Bradley, pawnbroker.

Horrie Bull's Farm Shop was next and then a derelict shop burnt down in the mid thirties but never rebuilt. It was followed by Henry's grocers, Misses Suttle's tobacconist shop, Pauline's dress shop and then Charlie Still an old fashioned real grocer (oh the smell of cured ham and roasting coffee!!) and Annie Tarrant in her sweet shop next to a dairy cum cafe cum green grocer and on to the Post Office before getting to Morley's. Yet another pawnbroker, two in about 50 yards. Does that say something about the times?

After James Street was there a tailors shop on the corner, Miss Lisle's haberdashery and toy shop gold mine and then the Christchurch Hall. Here the Boys Brigade used to blow their cheeks out ready for the church parade on Sunday and we Life Boys played indoor hockey twice a week.

On the opposite corner of Christchurch Street was Elliot and Langford cobblers of high quality and then sundry houses and odd shops to the top end of Fitzroy Street. They included Bill Biggs dairy on the corner of Wellington-Street whose horse would plod the round and stop outside every customers house without a word from Bill.

On the south side of Fitzroy Street, starting with Baker's sweet shop alongside the misses Woodhouse who ran a residential transport cafe for lorry drivers who parked overnight on New Square. They were two of the smallest little ladies you could imagine but the lorry drivers knew who was boss! Freeman Hardy & Willis, Alec Lovelock greengrocer and then Myers sweetshop. That closed at the start of the war and became the firewatching post for Fitzroy Street; after the war it was the first shop of Sid Pauly before he was bought out by George Peak and Willow Wholesale.

Next was Rossendale & Clamp newsagent, followed by Mr Mathews barber and then Tylers shoeshop. Then Timothy White & Taylor the chemist, a dress shop, Home & Colonial & the shop formerly Peaks on the corner of Eden Street. On the opposite corner was International Stores and then came The Fitzroy Arms, Williamson Carpets and then W. Thompson furnishers.

The Eden Chapel adjoined the Co-op shoe repair shop which was next to H. Legge baker (I can smell it now). It was followed by a little lock-up shop, a greengrocer with G.P. Hawkins (ahhh those sticky Chelsea buns yum yum) shop on the corner of Gold Street whilst on the opposite corner stood Verlanders with its permanent smell of paraffin and Jack Cartwright the barber.

Further along this stretch stood Gilbert the butcher, The Ancient Druids, Choppins, Whitehead the greengrocer and The Old English Gentleman which was run by Charlie Smith a tall slim man who always wore a wing collar & bow tie.

Beyond Nelson Street were mainly houses with one sort of general store just before East Road and that by and large was what Fitzroy was about up to the end of the war. Sorry to have been so long-winded but perhaps you'll find something of interest in all of these ramblings

Have projector, will travel by Mike Petty

Each week I head off to give a talk to this group or that, here or there, as I have done for some 30 or more years.

One of the benefits of such a nomadic life is being able to visit villages or communities in different parts of Cambridge; another is talking and listening to the people who attend the meetings. I always like to make my talk a little bit personal for the places I'm at - and what better way than via 'Our Time'.

Early April sees me further out than usual, with trips to Great Barton near Bury St Edmunds one week and Peterborough the next, both anxious to learn something about the fens and particular the floods of 1947. Cambridge also suffered during the rapid thaw that followed weeks of hard frosts and packed snow, though I have yet to see many pictures of the resulting flooding. My favourite is that of a line of parked cars along Newnham Road, but are there others. Then later I'm off to Yaxley near Peterborough where the Doctors' Group Practice has run an 'Age Well' project in their village for over 11 years where some of their older and early retired patients can have the opportunity to come together and keep their minds active. Once more it's the 1947 floods! [SCAN OF FLOODED CARS NEWNHAM ROAD CAMBRIDGE 1947 - SCAN OF FLOODED HOUSE AT HADDENHAM 1947, SCAN OF HEADLINES MARCH 1947]

Stuntney Social Club is the venue for a talk on 'Vanishing Cambridgeshire' on Thursday 8th April, which will give an opportunity to show a picture of a member of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society at work on their Cambridgeshire Photographic Survey in 1933. The photographer is James Henry Bullock who was their most prolific contributor, going out in his motor car – seen under the shade of the tree – around the county. This snap of him at work, was taken by another contributor, Dr William Mortlock Palmer, and is housed in the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library. But the picture that Bullock actually took is amongst the glass lantern slides at the County Record Office, Shire Hall. His eye was caught by an ancient notice warning vagrants that they were liable to arrest on sight. It has now gone, but are there other interesting signs on display elsewhere in the county? [SCANS OF BULLOCK AND VAGRANT NOTICE – 10194 & 84.809]

The Waddelow Society is a group of people dedicated to the history of their family name. Each year they organise get-togethers and on Easter Monday they are returning to the ancestral village of Lt Downham where they meet in the room that houses the community library, now being run by villagers with the assistance of the County Library service. Lt Downham is a community that believes in working to enhance its facilities and in August 1976 they were awarded the accolade of 'Best Kept Village in Cambridgeshire'. At the unveiling Lord Fairhaven said he had been impressed by the work of councillors, voluntary helpers and individual householders whilst most of the gardens were immaculate and a blaze of colour. [SCAN OF BEST KEPT VILLAGE PRESENTATION AUGUST 1976 – 59.56 OR 59.57]

Nearer home on 14th April the Royal Air Force Association are meeting at the Joint Ex-Servicemens' Club off Barnwell Road. The subject is Inter-War Cambridge and this is particularly relevant to this area since it was then that a ring road was planned around east side of Cambridge. The road was actually lined out, but postwar planners changed their minds and abandoned it. A News photograph of September 1964 shows Barnwell Road petering out into a grassy track with the cement works in the background. Then they changed their minds again and the road was built through to Coldham's Lane [SCAN OF BARNWELL ROAD 1964 – 70.02 OR 95.64]

Swavesey & District History Society are a most active group of enthusiasts who hold monthly meetings at the Village College. On 20th April they want me to talk about the River Cam, though at present the village seems more concerned about the proposed new guide bus route planned along the line of the Cambridge to St Ives railway which might ruin the tranquillity of the area. In previous years people had other things to talk about, as the News reported: Swavesey had a first class sensation on Monday night. It is not used to such novelties. It appears Swavesey has a widow. Nothing strange about that. But this was a fascinating widow. Her husband is scarcely cold in his newly-made grave before he is superseded. This is the story which bought out the inhabitants in hundreds into the main street to celebrate the widow on Monday evening. From eight o'clock until eleven the rattle of tin cans, the whistling and shouting, hooting and yelling, and a tuning of various other musical and unmusical instruments, filled the air in this usually quiet village. Whether these noisy attentions of the neighbours will do any real good is open to question. The date - June 1898 [SCAN OF SWAVESEY RAILWAY LINE, STATION AND CHURCH - 86.1389; PERHAPS PIX FROM NEWS FILES]

Two trips to the Arbury follow in quick succession with talks to the Arbury Manor Royal British Legion on the afternoon of the 21st – Fen life in the 1800s – and then Grovebury Ladies Club for a talk about, what they call “your work as a well known Cambridge historian and journalist”! There’s so much going on in the area that it is hard to realise just how isolated some of the new residents felt when they moved in to the new houses off Campkin Road back in the 1970s [PICTURE OF CAMPKIN ROAD OR ARBURY ROAD FROM NEWS FILES]

Add in the regular ‘Fenland History, sources and resources’ meetings at Ely Library on Friday mornings and it looks like an interesting month. Hopefully somebody will tell me something to write about.

Our Time 2004 06

King’s Parade & King Street, by Mike Petty

On the face of it there’s not much similarity between two of Cambridge’s most important central streets, King’s Parade and King Street.

King’s Parade is a wide thoroughfare, dominated on one side by some of the finest architecture in the world and on the other by a range of small shops selling an eclectic mix of goods. It has been photographed by thousands of visitors over the last century and for the most part the pictures taken in 1904 are virtually the same as those taken in more recent times. Today scaffolding wreaths the front of the shops whilst renovation takes place, yet when it is removed the view will once more appear very little changed from that photographed in 1887 at the time of Queen Victoria’s Jubilee celebrations.

But King Street residents were equally patriotic; they too decorated their street, but if one of those Victorians could return today they would have some difficulty recognising it. Then it had a charm and quaintness, and was home to dozens of families as well as a range of shops and numerous pubs. Now much of it has disappeared under less attractive architecture.

When Erica Dimock surveyed King Street for one of her ‘Down Your Street’ articles in March of 1963 she commented on the alterations that had even then transformed the area. She chatted to Robert Dent, a locksmith continuing the business established by his grandfather 70 years before, cutting between six and seven thousand keys each year. He recalled many changes that had taken place in his time, including bakehouses which had been replaced by for the new showroom for H.W. Peak’s furniture shop.

Peaks had been in King Street since 1906, when they dealt mainly in secondhand furniture, but now offered the newest designs in furniture, floorcoverings and electrical appliances. They had expanded into what had once been Captain Cooper’s Royal Military Riding School, in its day one of the best equipped in the country. Here a few pounds laid out in lessons could save many nasty falls, and hundreds of pounds in surgeon’s fees and horseflesh. Relics of the riding school, decaying stables and looseboxes could still be seen in the early 1980s.

King Street in the ‘60s was also home to some of the most modern of technical innovations with the firm of Metals Research Ltd working on materials for rockets for NASA, the American Space Administration from their unprepossessing premises. The firm had developed in close conjunction with the University, many of whose scientists acted as consultants or were shareholders.

Another academic link between two streets was the 'King Street Run'. It was a tradition – but like many traditions its origins were obscure. The event involved drinking eight pints of beer in two hours, one in each of eight different pubs. Originally King Street had enough pubs of its own such as the Champion of the Thames, Rhadegund, the Earl Grey and Yorkshire Grey, the Royal Arms and the Boot. But as numbers declined, and others declined to take part, the organisers needed to look further afield for landlords willing to support the event and the run was changed to allow one pint in four pubs and two pints in two.

Perhaps the beer was stronger, or the students had not undergone the necessary training, for landlord after landlord objected to the mess unruly contestants left behind them. As well as achieving a hangover, those who completed the course were entitled wear a coveted blue tie embroidered with a crown and tankard though a letter P was added for each time an entrant was obliged to use the toilet or was sick.

One man who knew more than most about ties was Peter Blake who owned a shop unique in Cambridge devoted to ties and cravats. He had more than 2,000 in stock in March 1963, and reported that most of his customers demanded the square-ended versions, though 20 per cent preferred the conventional wide tie and just five per cent the fashionable slim style. Some of his best customers were girls seeking something to wear with the striped shirts they had borrowed from the men. They preferred plain colours – in fact the old school tie was quite out of fashion. Surprisingly the shop was located in the Street, not amongst the bespoke tailors of King's Parade

There it was gowns that predominated, these being the distinctive uniform of members of the academic community that had to be worn after dark by undergraduates upon pain of being 'progged' by the University Proctor and his traditionally fleet-footed 'bulldogs'. Today such items of academic dress are exhibited in shop windows but seldom glimpsed in the street, their compulsory wearing having been abolished in 1965. But on formal occasions King's Parade becomes full of begowned figures making their way to a ceremony in the Senate House.

Both streets have in their time been dominated by traffic. King Street was a main thoroughfare for vehicles coming along the busy Newmarket Road. Vehicles of all sorts trundled through to Hobson Street or Sussex Street en route to the town centre. The traffic along King's Parade was even heavier. It seems hard now to realise that this was for many years a major through route, vehicles driving down Bridge Street, along Trinity and St John's Streets before continuing along the Parade towards Trumpington, whilst more came the other way, swinging right to get to the Market Hill. All this ceased on a foggy morning in February 1975 when signs were erected and a policeman stationed near the entrance to Trinity Street to enforce the restrictions.

King's College itself had been worried about parking back in the 1920s. When the heavy railings along the front of the College were removed in 1927 they sought assurances that the town council would not promptly claim the land for car parking; the low brick wall was erected in 1932.

But in 1963 King Street was benefiting by free all-day parking by the roadside, though there were worries that the proposed introduction of parking meters would drive shoppers away.

The University had been concerned about the impact of public transport in 1880 and opposed the laying of lines down the Parade for the horse-drawn trams back. Then when motor buses became common they offloaded their passengers opposite the Senate House until the opening of the Drummer Street bus station in 1925. But King Street had its own bus operator, Percival Motors whose coaches catered for tours to places such as the Isle of Man, Blackpool or even Oxford.

But the two streets have shared the darker side of life; both have been involved in murder. In King Street in 1921 the victim was sweetshop owner Alice Lawn who was found battered to death on the back stairs of her house in Milton's Walk. An itinerant French Polisher was arrested and sent for trial; over the four days of the trial there were long queues for copies of the Cambridge Daily News that carried reports of the proceedings, but in the event he was found not guilty and the murder never solved. But the man acquitted is reported to have taken to wearing a placard stating 'I am the Cambridge murderer' and later returned to the scene of the crime, swearing that he would kill those who had given evidence against him

The other case was even more sensational. It involved a King's College undergraduate back in 1930. The young man was always eccentric, had a reputation for being clever and was reading history. He also played the drums in a jazz band and had hired a grand piano which he kept in his room. He wasn't rich or famous, he hadn't been to Eton, and he didn't have the finance to maintain the lifestyle he adopted. He wore garish sweaters and plus-fours, claimed to be a Russian prince and ran up debts.

He also stole a pistol, teamed up with a friend from Fitzwilliam, changed his name and spent the merry month of May touring Cambridgeshire pubs in a secondhand car. When the money ran out they traded the car for a motorbike and set off for London where they found excitement, glamour and company in the flat of a girl named Madge. She worked in a nightclub, had a heart of gold and seemed used to strange young men popping in for a while. By the end of the weekend she knew these two were different. They obviously had money problems and had written to Cambridge for clothes they could pawn. They also had guns.

When they went to collect the parcel of clothes they found two men waiting who invited the runaways to return to Cambridge. Their escorts were fellow undergrads - after all there was nothing that a little chat could not sort out.

As luck would have it the King's man met his tutor in Trumpington Street. The two strolled off to sort things out over a glass of sherry in rooms in the Gibbs building beside the Chapel. A third figure followed. During their friendly chat a knock came at the door. The plain-clothed policeman had just started to read out his warrant when the first of five shots rang out, hitting him in the shoulder.

When the gunfire ceased the Police had a murdered colleague to bury with full honours, the College a famous explorer to mourn and the University was in the headlines for all the wrong reasons.

Both streets have seen major rebuilding but in different centuries. King's Parade was once a narrow street with houses obscuring the view of King's College chapel. They are shown on one of the oldest Cambridge maps dating from the 1590s and survived almost to the Victorian age. Then they were ripped down and replaced by an elegant screen which in its turn was fenced off with heavy railings. This is the vista snapped by so many visitors. Then in the 1860s the old buildings of Gonville and Caius were replaced with others in a design that many still consider more appropriate for a railway station than a college

Yet King Street have had less happy experience with college buildings. When in the 1960s Christ's College replaced quaint, domestic style dwellings fronting the Street with a modern accommodation block it was attacked for its architectural inhumanity, ruining the environment and being out of character in a street that once had characters in abundance.

Today King Street is a mixture of the old and new, providing homes far nicer than those in the cul-de-sacs that characterised the area. But although they were cramped, dark and lacked the amenities now considered essential they provided generations of folk with a place to live in the heart of the town, something that very few can say of King's Parade, Cambridge's showpiece street

Cambridgeshire Windmills by Mike Petty –

The news that Bourn windmill, one of the oldest surviving post mills in the country has reopened after a two-year renovation project would have pleased three windmill enthusiasts of 80 years ago.

“Windmills are disappearing so fast that in many parts of the country they are a forgotten race. Some day antiquarians will be examining and digging in mounds, having quite forgotten that they were the mounds of old windmills made to raise them a little above the surrounding land.” Henry Hughes told members of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society in November 1928

Together with J.H. Bullock and Rex Wailes he set about making a record of the windmills then existing throughout Cambridgeshire and the Isle of Ely. It was not an encouraging task for such enthusiasts. They found the oldest mill at Bourn had been out of commission for some six years, its sails having been smashed in a gale in 1925, finishing its working life. But fears that it would be lost were dispelled when it was acquired by the Cambridge Preservation Society who have continued to preserve it. French's Mill off Victoria Road in Cambridge was still standing, though without sails, [FRENCH'S MILL 1930s] as was the tower of the windmill in Hurst Park Avenue which was finally demolished in 1957. [HURST PARK CUTTING], But there was no sign of the mill at King's Hedges, near Milton which had been sketched in the 1850s [KINGS HEDGES MILL 1856]. The mill at Long Road Trumpington had also disappeared though Miss Moore, the daughter of the last miller told them it had been built in 1812, with part of the works coming from an old mill which had then recently been pulled down near Barrington. It had stopped working in the spring of 1887 and a year later was sold to John Peile, the Master of Christ's College. He tried to let it but failing to do so had it pulled down. Photographer R.L. Lord snapped it in its prime [TRUMPINGTON 1880s]

A number were still working though their number grew less every year. The long irregular hours needed to make the most of windy weather and the long spells of enforced idleness were a great difficulty without some auxiliary power. Some millers, however, were still making wheat flour including Mr Lawrence of Stretham, who then kept quite a good business going. The mill at Stretham lost its sails during the Second World War when it was taken over by the Royal Observer Corps as a look-out post. Although within recent years the sails have been put back, the machinery has gone for ever. [STRETHAM COLOUR 1930s]

Mills faced a variety of dangers. If the corn ran out the friction of the millstones made the stones very hot, sometimes causing fires. A windmill with the sails burning at night was one of the most terrifying of all sights, Hughes reported, adding that many Fordham people still remembered the sight of their mill burning. The mill on the Isleham Road was rebuilt after the fire in 1877 and survived until 1950 [FORDHAM MILL 1931]. They also needed specialist repairs and the Antiquarians took a series showing the Soham firm of Hunts millwrights at work [HUNTS]

Drainage mill used to be a very familiar sight in the fens, and the Cambridge Antiquarians took a picture of a group of small mills either side of the River Lark deep in Soham fen in 1914. Recently Jim Ames from Soham told me how his grandmother used to live in one of these mills and often could not leave through one of the mill doors, for the cap revolved according to the direction of the wind and she might be hit by a sail. [SOHAM MILLS 1914]. There was a large mill at Soham mere, belonging to the Cambridgeshire County Council with the old type of tail beam and old types of sail. "Long may they be preserved by the bodies that own them" Hughes exhorted. Sadly it was not to be. By 1947 the mill was thought to be dangerous and the Council felt that the only answer lay in demolition. Enthusiasts protested at the loss of this rare survival of a drainage mill but to no avail - it was just too rickety. So the demolition men moved in to pull it over with a tractor. They failed. Undaunted they returned with gunpowder. They failed. So in the end eight charges of gelignite had to be used to topple the "dangerous" structure. [SOHAM 1929]. Ironically just eight years later another drainage mill, much younger, much less impressive and in a much worse state, was re-built and erected just next door at Wicken Fen, where it is lauded as the last of the fenland wind drainage mills.

The News files has pictures of several Cambridgeshire mills which supplement those taken by the Cambridge Antiquarians, whose files are deposited in the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library alongside many other photographs taken by enthusiasts over the years.

Some Cambridgeshire mills

Fulbourn mill was built in 1808 and ground animal feed until it was damaged by a storm in July 1933. The Cambridge Chronicle reported: "Fulbourn windmill has been struck by lightning and is in danger of demolition. In a recent storm the mill was split from top to bottom on one side. Its sails were also damaged and it is likely that it will have to be dismantled. The steps leading into the mill were shattered but a man standing only a foot away had a miraculous escape from injury. The mill was evidently struck twice, and heavy iron bolts were thrown 30 yards. It is one of the finest examples of Dutch work and with three sets of stones is one of the most powerful windmills in England. Mr Mapey has spent a considerable sum in keeping the mill in repair and the Cambridge Preservation Society has been anxious that it should be preserved". The mill ceased to work in 1937 and remained derelict until restored by Fulbourn Windmill Society between 1974 and 1987. [FULBOURN EXTERIOR AND INTERIOR, 1930S]

Haddenham windmill was causing concern 50 years ago. There were worries that the mill, a landmark in the fens, would become a dangerous structure if not repaired soon. It was scheduled as an historic building but the Ministry would not make a grant to aid its preservation. Experts estimated it would then cost about £2,000 to put it into a sound condition. It was still in poor condition in 1965 when the News pictured Mr John Lawrance, then 81, who had owned the windmill for more than 60 years. [HADDENHAM 1965]. The News returned again in March 1995 when four sails were lifted into place completing the restoration of the main structure of the mill though there was plenty to be done to restore the mill to full working order. The old machinery was seized and rusted, millstones had to be repaired and the old brake wheel replaced. [HADDENHAM 1995]

Madingley windmill was one that disappeared and came back again! The tenant, Mr Charles French, was in bed one July night in 1909 when he heard the mill creaking ominously under the weight of the millstones and it collapsed. The great oak timbers were so shattered as to make restoration impossible. [MADINGLEY COLOUR c1909] But in 1935 came the news that a new mill would be erected on the site: The purchase of a post mill at Ellington, five miles from Huntingdon, completed a six years' search by Mr Ambrose Harding the Squire of Madingley. Workmen were engaged in dismantling the mill, calling for great care, as it is essential that none of the timbers were harmed. New foundations were being dug on the site of the old mill at Madingley and the process of reassembling Ellington undertaken. This was not the first move that the mill has made. From its original site it was transported across several fields to a spot where its sails might better catch the wind. [MADINGLEY MILL FROM NEWS FILES – OR TAKE MODERN VIEW]

Six Mile Bottom mill on Bungalow Hill is another mill that had moved. It was probably built on Mill Moor in Burrough Green and was moved to Westley Bottom in Westley Waterless sometime between 1796 and 1810. When the Great Chesterford to Newmarket railway was built in 1846, the mill was moved to its present position because it stood in the path of the railway. In 1879 the mill was damaged by lightning. It ceased to work in the 1920 's and steadily deteriorated until restoration work in 1983. [SIX MILE BOTTOM c1956]

Swaffham Prior is one village that has two mills. In 1928 Rex Wailes noted: "One mill is out of action and rapidly decaying. The other is still working but seldom repaired". The second mill finally ceased to work in 1946. By the 1960s they were both derelict and without sails but were restored shortly afterwards and their sails renewed. One was brought back into use and the other converted into a house. [SWAFFHAM PRIOR 1928]

West Wratting mill has probably the most romantic tale. In 1932 Philippa Burrell bought the windmill for £600 - including a cottage, granary and 20 acres of good farming land. High & isolated she found it a little paradise – and promptly left to study in Paris! She returned in 1934 when she wrote plays and learned about planting and pruning – and all the while the windmill was watching her with its broken sails, cap all out, windows rotten and rain going in. It was an unwelcoming part of the property, and one she used to hide in when the bailiffs called. A millwright gave her an estimate of £100 for repair and to raise the money she studied cookery books and made date cakes which she sold from an old pram on Cambridge market, a picture of the mill fixed to the side. It was an immediate sensation and soon she was selling teas to the hundreds of people who journeyed to see the mill, sitting contentedly on rustic tables in the orchard. After two seasons however she closed the business as the mill was restored. It was not the end of the story; she wrote a play 'The wind and the mill' which was performed by the Festival Theatre Company in the fields around the windmill in June 1935. [WEST WRATTING CUTTING]

Our Time 2004 07 - Cherry Hinton Road by Mike Petty –

Cherry Hinton Road extends for one and a half miles in a virtually straight line between Hills Road and the former village of Cherry Hinton. At the start of the 1900s it was virtually fields all the way but things had changed by February 1964 when the News sent its columnist Erica

Dimock 'Down your street' to report on what she found. Her report paints a picture of the people and shops of that time, many of which have now passed away

Dominating the corner with Hills Road was the Cattle Market where each Monday farmers came to buy and sell their stock at one of the biggest and best venues of its type in the region. Claude Kirkup, its former manager, recalled that when he first started over 30 years before there were only about four farmers with motor vehicles, the others brought their stock in horse-drawn vehicles or drove their livestock along the road. [SHEEP ON SALE AT CATTLE MARKET, 1960s]

But it was the general Bank Holiday markets that saw the site really heaving with thousands of people looking for bargains as stalls packed the area. [STOCKINGS ON SALE AT CATTLE MARKET 1968].

Back in 1964 planners were considering the future of the site: there was even talk of a cinema but the plans were met with opposition and nothing came of them. Now, 60 years later, the area has been comprehensively redeveloped with a new cinema and bowling alley amongst the leisure facilities shortly to open together with a restaurant, hotel and car park adjoining the Junction, Cambridge's popular venue for young people. [FIND PICTURE OF THE JUNCTION]

It is now a busy road but older residents could remember it as a country lane running between fields of corn bright with the purple of the saffron crocus. George Bowyer, then 84 years old recalled: "Cherry Hinton Road was just a cart track between high hedges and deep ditches" and remembered the transformation bought about by the development of the Rock Estate which started in 1885. Date stones on many of the terraces indicate that most of the building took place before 1910.

Then came two periods of expansion of the Cambridge boundaries. In 1912 the land between Rathmore Road and Perne Road was brought into the borough to be followed in 1934 by an even larger extension and housing rapidly grew in the open fields towards the little village of Cherry Hinton. [CHERRY HINTON ROAD IN 1920S WITH CAR AND OPEN TOP BUS]

But it was not all rural tranquillity. One early business was the Swiss Laundry that started at the turn of the century and operated a 24-hour dry-cleaning service, with four vans collecting washing from University colleges. [SCAN 0161.090].

Just behind their premises were others occupied by a glue and chemical works, that had previously been workshops of the Doe family who traded for many years in hide and skins, trimming and grading them before selling them for tanning. They bought bones and fat from butchers throughout the region to be sorted at their premises before being sent out to soap manufactures.

Further down the road in 1964 were the premises of E.A. Blows, a sanitary and hot water engineer who combined plumbing with a lawn mower repair service. He could remember when the fields adjacent to the present Perne Road had been filled with tents as soldiers of Kitchener's army assemble for training in the early months of the Great War. Later the site was pressed into use again, this time for a military hospital. But not all the locals welcomed these latter 'heroes' for they were men suffering from Venereal Diseases. [HORSE-DRAWN AMBULANCES ON CHERRY HINTON ROAD DURING WW1]

Earlier in 1914 the same site had become a makeshift airfield where French pilot Gustav Hamel gave an exhibition of looping the loop in his aeroplane and attracted spectators from miles around. [BI-PLANE IN FIELD]

Refreshment was available at The Rock public house kept in February 1964 by a professional footballer, John Gavin, who had played for a variety of clubs, including Spurs, Norwich, Watford, Crystal Palace, Cambridge City and Newmarket. The pub provided live music at weekends with an electric organ and drums attracting passing trade. Nearby the Constitutional and Rathmore clubs also provided places where people could meet for a social drink and discussion and both had a membership of about 500 people.

This end of the road offered a wide variety of shops and services ranging from off-licences to the Co-op, from drapers to fishmongers, butchers, newsagents and sweetshops. [SCAN 0161.084 – NB NOT SURE OF THE NAME OF THE SHOP]

The oldest-established were that of Dave Halls, a boot and shoe repairer and A & A Mears, fishmongers who could boast that many of those who went to the shop when it had first opened 40 years earlier had remained loyal customers. Nearby was probably the city's oldest hairdresser, W.L. Asbury, then 75 years old, who had started his ladies hairdressing salon back in 1932.

Further along the road towards Cherry Hinton were the workshops and piano showrooms of Ken Stevens, the musical instrument dealer. Here pianos were taken for cleaning and reconditioning, some being in such a bad condition that they had to be taken to pieces. All in all it was an area with numerous goods and services many of which had been in business for 30 years and more.

As the road continues towards the former village of Cherry Hinton so the development becomes more recent. At the start of the 1960s the appearance of the Perne Road junction had been completely changed by the erection of a garage and shops at what was then known as 'Adkins Corner'. The supermarket had opened in 1963 and was the largest of their string of shops in a chain that had begun as a family butcher's. [SCAN 0161.092 – ADKINS SHOP 1964]

Nearby King and Harper had opened a service station in March of 1963 as the basis for its motor cycle and scooter centre. It also boasted what was then Cambridge's only self-service car wash with long queues building up at weekends to make use of the facilities at half-a-crown a time. [SCAN 0161.094 – CAR WASH, 1964]

Other companies in the area included Crystal Structures, scientific consultants and instrument makers which had been founded in 1947 and was one of the very few firms then to have a woman as managing director – Mrs Nora Wooster. Nearby were the head offices of William Sindall the building contractors then employing 1,200 people. They had moved from Gloucester Street some five years earlier and managing director, H.D. Ridgeon had just sold farmland surrounding his house at Ventress Farm just along the road for building purposes. [SCAN 0161.085 – STONEMASON AT WORK AT SINDALLS]

New companies were becoming established in the early 1960s: Danish Bacon had just increased their distribution facilities and installed the very latest machines for smoking bacon with a kitchen in which several hundred hams were cooked each week. [SCAN 0161.095 – SIDES OF MEAT]. Newey and Eyre electrical wholesalers were just moving in to buildings formerly occupied by H.B. Holttum, the horticultural engineers and nearby was Baywood Chemicals whose products were used for weed control with one of the most important being Metasystox for virus on sugar beet.

But by the time Dan Jackson surveyed the street again for the Cambridge Weekly News in January 1988 many of the heavy industries which dominated the road had been replaced by blocks of flats and private houses with industrial parks tucked away behind them.

Such development increases the number of cars but Cambridgeshire Motors had been in the area since 1927 with one depot servicing and repairing all types of Ford commercial vehicles and tractors and their main motor showroom back on the corner of Hills Road. [SCAN OF GARAGE ON CORNER WITH HILLS ROAD].

Adding to the traffic in 1964 were the lorries of the Cambridge branch of British Road Services that had been established on a site used during the war by the Ministry of Transport as a depot for vehicles which might be needed in the event of an invasion. [SCAN 0161.089 – GOODS BEING LOADED AT BRS DEPOT 1964].

Lime Tree farm, opposite the B.R.S. site had been run by generations of the Coe family and for some 200 years its fields and orchards had provided local shops and colleges with fruit and vegetables. It had a small shop that had opened as a café during the Second World War offering cups of tea to the lorry drivers who arrived at the transport centre opposite.

There were more military memories surrounding Cherry Hinton Hall, just down the road, that had been used during the war for training firemen. It was home to a nursery school run by Miss Littlehales that by 1964 still had a long waiting list for places and also housed a maternity and child warfare clinic. [SCAN 0161.093 – CHILDREN AT NURSERY SCHOOL CHERRY HINTON HALL, 1964]

In its grounds were cultivated plants and flowers for the city's parks and roundabouts (remember when Cambridge had roundabouts?) and since 1965 – a year after Erica Dimock's survey - it has become home to the Cambridge Folk Festival, its grounds resounding to a different sort of music than that which entertains the youngsters at the other end of Cherry Hinton Road [SCAN OF FOLK FESTIVAL 1965 – OR FIND OTHER PHOTOS OF FOLK FESTIVAL]

STREET LIGHTS - 1949 by Mike Petty –

In January 1949 motorists at Trumpington experienced a warm glow, the shadows that had been blighting their lives disappeared at least in part when sodium lighting was introduced as an experiment on the stretch of road between Brooklands Avenue and Bentley Road.

Twelve 140-watt bulbs dramatically improved their night time visibility providing six times more light than the old fittings and at cheaper cost. By 1952 the Council had decided to install 400 of the new lights in a crash programme and the following year Cambridge could boast that it was one of the first cities in the country to be lit entirely by sodium.

Sometimes brighter lights caused dangers in 1911 complaints had been aired that the new gas lights on Barnwell Bridge were too powerful and were dazzling motorists. Generally however they were appreciated.

New lights were welcomed in one village: "The traffic through Sawston has increased considerably of late years" commented the Cambridge Chronicle. "The one continuous street, in the bends and narrow parts, where the inhabitants are their thickest, has been dangerous to drive through during the dark evenings of winter" a common statement, except that it was written in November 1882.

It was 1836 when the streets of Ely were lighted with coal gas for the first time; the lamps were "well made and placed upon elegant painted cast iron pillars" and the inhabitants well pleased with the result. Swavesey had followed suit in February 1886 with Willingham limping behind in 1891, whilst at Fulbourn in January 1893 a public supper was held at the Six Bells Inn to celebrate the completion of the lighting of their village by oil lamps following a successful experiment the previous year. The parish debates all took much time.

In 1893 Cherry Hinton were anxiously scanning the various Acts of Parliament to see which one was best suited to their circumstances. Such had been the recent expansion that unless they were careful the old part of the village would end up paying for the lighting of the newly developed Rock and Cavendish estates. They were also debating the type of light – oil or gas or perhaps they should form their own company to generate electricity, at a cost of about £4,000.

It was a familiar debate for Cambridge where in 1757 people were quite convinced that better lighting would increase fights between groups who then groped their way past each other unrecognised in the dark. However an Act of Parliament of 1788 empowered the better lighting of the town, new lamps were installed and lit for the first time on a September evening that year. Oil lamps gave way to gas and in 1840 a contract was signed with the Cambridge Gas Light Company for the installation of 350 lamps. The first lamp post was installed outside the Newmarket Road works and others followed throughout the central area.

The lamp posts themselves were often the subject of motor accidents or high spirits, with inebriated undergraduates often shinnying up them to light their cigarettes from the gas flame. During rag time it became the norm to put out the light. The answer to this was to wrap the posts in greasy rags to prevent people climbing them – though it was soon realised that such greasy rags could easily be set alight – a much better sport!

During both World Wars the lights were extinguished and a reflective strip painted on the posts to prevent people walking into them in the black out. However it was on VJ night in 1945 that the most prominent street light became a casualty of the celebrations. The large light on Parker's Piece had been erected in 1894 at a cost of £39 and when repaired and redesigned in 1946 became the first fluorescent light in the country. It was repainted in 1973 and now adds a touch of brightness to the Cambridge scene by both day and night.

Castle Street by Mike Petty

Castle Street has seen some of the most dramatic events in Cambridge history even since the days when early settlers decided to make their home on its rising slopes overlooking the winding river Cam. The Romans raised a camp there, the Normans reinforced it, Cromwell added fortifications and it was strengthened even further during the Second World War just in case another invader came.

Now the present occupiers, Cambridgeshire County Council, are worrying about the number of visitors clambering up the castle hill not to storm its offices but to gaze at the view from the summit of the mound. The prospect has been depicted by engravers for over 200 years who have used their artistic abilities to enhance the panorama. [SCAN 9051 – VIEW FROM CASTLE HILL c1830 - SCAN 10112 VIEW LOOKING TO CASTLE STREET 1937]

The remains of an ancient castle gatehouse erected by King Edward I in the 1280's survived until the early 1800s. It had been built to strengthen the earlier fortifications of William the Conqueror, erected when he was attempting to suppress Hereward the Wake and his rebels on the Island of Ely. There had been walls all around the castle, but they were pulled down over the years and the stone reused in the building of various colleges and churches.. [SCAN 1327 - VIEW DOWN CASTLE HILL c1800 – TAKE MODERN VIEW]

The castle was strengthened during the Civil War when the University supported King Charles and the town backed Oliver Cromwell. He put in banks and ditches and garrisoned it with troops. Tradesmen in the area expecting to prosper by additional custom were disappointed for many of the men were nearly starving, with only tatty coats & shoes and often never paid for the goods they supplied. Then when the war was nearly over in 1646 the defences were demolished and the soldiers and their horses sent to Ireland. The castle carried on being used for the assizes. In one case in 1665 one robber was pressed to death – he was about an hour dying – because he refused to plead guilty or not guilty when charged. Another man was put in the pillory and two more were hanged. [SCAN OF CASTLE FROM MAP OF 1574]

The gallows used to stand in the moat in front of the castle but this was filled up in 1802 when the whole area was lowered to build a new gaol designed by John Howard the prison reformer. [SCAN 667 – COLOUR VIEW OF GAOL WITH CASTLE MOUND AND REMAINS OF CASTLE GATEHOUSE c1810]

Public hangings were then conducted from the gateway of the new County Gaol attracting crowds who came to watch the spectacle and buy souvenirs of the occasion. They continued to be held, though no longer in public until 1913. [SCAN OF HANDBILL OF HANGING]

The gaol continued in use until 1916 after which it housed Government records while debate raged about the future of the site. In 1930 its forbidding doors were thrown open to the public and 8,000 people queued for a chance to enter the condemned cell before the fittings and fixtures were sold off – the gallows fetching just under £5 – and the building demolished. Elderly residents still recall their visit to the gaol or growing up in the shadow of the prison walls. [SCAN 22447 – GAOL FROM CASTLE HILL 1930]

But another old structure remained. In 1842 a new Assize Court was built of brick and stone in the Italian style, It had an imposing portico supported on columns and its roof was dominated by large figures. By 1952 the whole of the building was found to be unsafe and liable to collapse at any time. Dry rot had been attacking the floors and spread up the walls and plaster and into the roof. The damage was irreparable. Nor was it much use as a Court House as three prisoners had escaped by removing an iron grill over a window and running off. Its demolition sparked great controversy, with the city council feeling the façade should be preserved and resited elsewhere. [SCAN 6828 ASSIZE COURTS – NOW THE GRASS AREA IN FRONT OF THE COUNCILLORS' CAR PARK]

On the site of the gaol rose a new Shire Hall, replacing offices in Hobson Street. It opened without ceremony in 1932 and was soon found to be too small, with plans for an extra storey on top being announced in 1958. Since then its area of administration has expanded, taking in the former Isle of Ely in 1964 and embracing Huntingdonshire and Peterborough ten years later. So too has its office space which, together with extensive commercial developments now extends to Victoria Road wiping Gloucester Street off the map. [SCAN 8929 – RECEPTION ON LAWN IN FRONT OF SHIRE HALL OR 9859 – COUNTY COUNCIL ‘AT HOME’ 1962 WITH CASTLE MOUND IN BACKGROUND]

Redevelopment has also transformed the west side of Castle Street. It was just 25 years ago that a massive new office block finally arose from what had been for some years the biggest hole in the city. It was to have been the site for a high-class De Vere Hotel, then it was to become shops, petrol station, a bank and maisonettes but the plans had been rejected.. [FIND PICTURE OF DE VERE HOTEL – PERHAPS NEG 750.79]

Across Mount Pleasant the Foundation of Edward Storey have made a much more successful addition to their historic Almshouses site providing self-contained accommodation for a number of ladies, many of whom have wonderful memories of the area. It is a part of Cambridge that has been transformed within recent years. At the beginning of the 1900 it was a very depressed area of poor-quality houses. Yet when the slums were cleared and new homes built then the former residents could not afford the new rents and were forced to move away. More recently many of the other properties in nearby Shelley Row and Albion Row have been rebuilt or renovated. [SCAN 10440 SHELLEY ROW 1937 – TAKE MODERN EQUIVALENT]

Even in the 1970s many of the other properties were in poor condition; when Professor John Stevens bought two properties in Bells Court they had both preservation and demolition orders on them at the same time. [SCAN 10094 – BELL COURT 1937]

Kettles Yard comprised a large and crowded court of 26 houses stretching back to Honey Hill that were condemned and pulled down before the Second World War. The two largest were converted to form Kettles Yard art gallery. [FIND KETTLE’S YARD ART GALLERY pic]

The spiritual welfare of its residents was served by a number of churches and chapels of which St Peter’s Church is the smallest; it was founded shortly after the Conquest at about the time William was constructing his castle. It had to be underpinned in 1932 to stop it falling down and was declared redundant in 1958. It is now cared for by The Churches Conservation Trust. [SCAN 10439 - ST PETER’S CHURCH FROM KETTLES YARD 1937]

St Giles’ on the corner of Chesterton Lane was an even older foundation dating back to Saxon times was rebuilt in 1875 while Castle Street Methodist Church originally started in a small cottage on the site in 1821. The present chapel was built 1914 and continues to attract large congregations whose plans to rebuild are currently being debated. [SCAN 9861 OLD ST GILES CHURCH 1875 – TAKE MODERN COMPARISON]

Several pubs have served other needs. The most famous was the Three Tuns Inn, also known as Waymans Inn. It was here – just across the road from the castle - that the highwayman Dick Turpin used to sleep when visiting Cambridge and it was from here that Elizabeth Woodcock started her journey home to Impington in 1799 when she became buried in snow for eight days. The pub fell into disrepair but was renovated in the 1930s. Despite all the work magistrates refused to renew its licence. The County Arms was built as a replacement and the Three Tuns was demolished in August 1936. [SCAN 611558 THREE TUNS AFTER RENOVATION – BUT IT WAS DEMOLISHED ANYWAY – TAKE MODERN EQUIVALENT OF COUNTY ARMS]

Another was the White Horse Inn on the corner of Castle Street. It dated from the 16th century and contained many original features, although an overhanging upper storey was removed in 1932 as it had been clipped numerous times by passing buses and lorries. The pub closed in 1934 and was threatened with demolition for road widening. However thanks to the support of many influential people it reopened as a Folk Museum in 1936. It is now undergoing renovation with a new extension being constructed in the former yard where horses were once stabled. [SCAN 10113 – VIEW FROM MAGDALENE STREET 1937 SHOWING NEWLY-OPENED FOLK MUSEUM – NOTE HORSEMAN - PERHAPS MODERN COMPARISON?]

Today Castle Street carries comparatively little traffic but there are two tangible reminders of its present importance on the transport scene. One is a stone on the wall of one of the buildings stating ‘The Godmanchester Turnpike Road ends here’ – although the original tollhouse actually stood at the junction with Histon Road. [TAKE MODERN VIEW OF THE SIGN]

The second are the traffic lights; they were the first to be installed in Cambridge in 1929 and caused considerable controversy. The cost of a policeman on point duty was about £400 a year and the signals, with purchase, would be about £200 with about £25 a year maintenance and repairs. But some councillors disagreed; Coun Stubbs described it as ‘robot policemen’. He did not see how traffic could be controlled as well as by human means: “I can see myself telling it to mind its own business”. It was at the wrong place, being at the bottom of a steep hill; it would be better at the East Road – Mill Road crossing. Nevertheless they were installed and, according to some, failed in their primary purpose. For it took twice as many police as previously. One to sort out the accidents that resulted, with motorists not understanding the changing lights. The other to control the crowds who flocked to watch the new ‘illuminations’.

Today Castle Street is probably more peaceful than throughout most of its history. It no longer shudders under the weight of heavy lorries and although crowds still sometimes assemble outside the Shire Hall they are no longer gathering for a public execution – though perhaps it feels that way to councillors facing unpopular decisions.

Our Time 2004 09

ST ANDREWS STREET, by Mike Petty

St Andrew’s Street was one of the oldest approaches to Cambridge, the Roman Via Devana from Colchester to Chester. As a major thoroughfare it carried a great deal of traffic though its progress was checked by a gate near St Andrew the Great church where the road crossed the Kings Ditch – about where the present barricade stops the traffic.

Kings Ditch was a 13th-century man-made defensive work that stretched from the River at Quayside, under the present Sidney Sussex College, down Hobson Street, across Lion Yard and down Mill Lane to the river. It soon became less of a defence than a nuisance, becoming a good place to dump rubbish or the remains of animals killed by the butchers who had their businesses in Slaughter House Lane, the present Corn Exchange Street. In the 1600s efforts were made to divert a stream of water into the ditch to clean it out and some of the water from Hobson’s Conduit flowed along one side of St Andrew’s Street, as it still does down Trumpington Street. By 1952 people were complaining that it had had its day: “It makes the street narrower, especially when cars are parked and buses are forced close to the kerb. I saw a quart of water splashed into the lap of an infant in a small go-cart when a bus went past Stanley Woolston’s shop at a smart walking pace and its mother was unable to manoeuvre out of the bus’s bow wave. I’ll wager she would like to see the tap turned off“ wrote Mr O.C. Cox

St Andrew's Street starts in the south with the imposing frontage of the former Police and Fire Station, erected in 1901 to replace a building which had become infamous in the annals of Cambridge: the Spinning House. This had once been a workhouse, endowed by the carrier Thomas Hobson to provide accommodation and work for the decent unemployed as well as a place of correction for rogues. By the mid 1800s it was divided in two, one part serving as a police station the other being used by the University as their private prison for prostitutes. It soon attracted adverse attention: stories spread about the conditions in which the women were kept and how quite innocent young ladies were wrongly imprisoned and held without any trial. Not all the inmates accepted their imprisonment quietly, one managed to escape to her parent's house at Dullingham where she was arrested on a charge of gaol-breaking. But this meant the case had to be tried in court; it attracted wide attention, questions were asked in Parliament and the Home Secretary intervened. Matters came to a head in 1894 when a girl called Daisy Hopkins was arrested and this time the case was held in public. Because of a legal technicality Daisy had to be acquitted and she sued the University for damages. Once more it made headline news which prompted the University to surrender their powers over prostitutes to the police.

The old building was demolished to great rejoicing as the Cambridge Daily News reported in April 1899: "The days of the Cambridge Spinning House are numbered. It is to be pulled down in order that a house of detention after the best approved modern ideas may arise on its site. There is no more stirring chapter in the history of modern Cambridge than that which this forbidding looking building in St Andrew's Street recalls. It speaks of many things which the Cambridge of today is glad to forget. It is an ugly monument of an ugly feud between the authorities of the University and town. The feud is dead: would that the razing to the ground of the Spinning House were sufficient to efface all memory of it" [SCAN 19982 SPINNING HOUSE 1875]

The Police Station & Fire Station was constructed to house a force of 200 men. Its Renaissance style front, groined ceilings and mosaic floors won it warm architectural praise while modern speaking tubes together with a basement room for drying clothes and making coffee placed it in the forefront of police development nationally. James Sutton and Charles Smith were best able to testify to some of its other facilities for they were the first to sample the cells, one for stealing walnuts, the other for drunkenness. It also provided a home for the Fire Brigade with three permanent salaried firemen on duty, one during the day, and two during the night. They had a double call bell to the stables of the Lion Hotel where there were two horses in readiness to be called out for the fire tender. A steam fire engine was bought in 1906 with a motor engine in 1920. The building continued to serve until the present Parkside station was opened in 1965.

Then architects turned their attention to the next building in the Street: the old St Andrew's Street Baptist Chapel. "The Chapel is not exactly a thing of beauty and the removal of the present front in favour of one of greater architectural beauty will be a welcome contribution to the aesthetics of Cambridge", said the Cambridge Daily News in March 1901. Others agreed: "It has often excited the curiosity of strangers and not a little ridicule has been bestowed upon those who have worshipped in such a prison-like building. Even Charles Spurgeon described it as suitable for private executions". Work commenced in May 1903 with a bottle placed under the foundation stone containing a plan of the church, a programme of the day's ceremony and a copy of the Cambridge Daily News. It was formally dedicated the following January attracting praise: "The exterior of the building is captivating, the interior is beautiful and the structural arrangements for the comfort of the congregation well considered".

Nestling alongside the Chapel was one of Cambridge's oldest inns, 'Ye Olde Castel Hotel'. It stood on the site of the medieval Rudds Hostel, said to be the place where the meeting was held to establish Emmanuel College across the street. It was a gem of a place - a mass of gables and windows, higgledy-piggledy construction and with an aura of hospitality seeming to permeate from it. Inside was a staircase whose every step seemed to tell tales of those who had trod that way before, its ancient oriel window gave a glimpse into the gardens of Emmanuel college while lively conversation emanated from the Smoking Room. It offered a fine table with fine food finely prepared. In 1904 W.O Tristram described a dinner of turkey complemented by the sausages for which Cambridge was famous followed by baked apples and cream, washed down with a wine of twice the quality and half the price one would expect to find in grander establishments. Sadly it is there no longer; the old building was destroyed by fire in 1934. [SCAN 9597 - STREET FROM CASTLE INN TO POLICE STATION IN 1911 AND/OR SCAN 6207 COLOUR VIEW C1905 TAKE MODERN VIEW]

The Regal Cinema opened on part of the site three years later; it was the most up-to-date in Cambridge and one of the largest in East Anglia, seating 2,000 people. During the 1960s many of the now-legendary pop groups performed live on its stage, including the Beatles, Rolling Stones, Adam Faith and Cliff Richard. It doubled the number of screens in 1972, before succumbing to the demand for newer and bigger cinemas though films continue to be shown at the Arts Picture House in part of the building. The rest has been converted into one of the newer and bigger pubs that now cater for far more people than ever patronised the Castle supplying a wide range of food as well as drink.

Nearby the Varsity Restaurant was visited by a food critic in 1975: "The Varsity restaurant is not the place to go if you are fussy in demanding smart décor. But it does offer good wholesome food at extremely low prices. We saw one elderly gentleman complaining that his carafe of wine (£1.10 a half litre) was too cold. The obliging waiter held it in front of an electric convector fire to bring it to a more acceptable temperature. It was little more than a gesture, as the fire was not plugged in. We ate a three-course meal, with wine, and the bill for two was £3.25"

For those who were fussy about what they ate and drank from Barrett's supplied a fine range of fine glass and china; for those who wanted fine linen there was the Belfast established in 1905 with bedding and quilts produced at its own factory in Southend. Its sales attracted crowds: "About 200 cups of tea were served to bargain hunters as they queued waiting for the opening of the Belfast Linen Store's January sale. The queue started to form along St Andrew's Street soon after 5 a.m. and the long, chilly vigil was relieved by a welcome cup of piping hot tea at about 8 o'clock. It was dispensed from a van supplied by Hobb's Pavilion, Parker's Piece. First bargains to go were quilt sets slashed from 12 to four guineas, spring interior mattresses reduced to £3 19s. and pillow cases at 1s. each" the News reported in January 1953

For those people who wanted to keep in the height of fashion Vogue and Modiste were near neighbours. Both had opened in the 1930s and both were run by members of the Harris family. Vogue specialised in clothes from 12 leading fashion houses in London. In 1953 they sold an afternoon dress of pure silk dress to be worn in Westminster Abbey on Coronation Day at a price of 65 guineas. "We are absolutely thrilled, it is a great honour", said Mr M. Harris, the proprietor adding they had also sold three evening gowns to be worn at Coronation balls in London. [SCAN OF CROWDS OUTSIDE VOGUE SALE 1963]

Any activities in this part of St Andrew's Street could be monitored by the reporters of the Cambridge Daily News who had their offices across the road from 1888 to 1962. They were on hand to report the various surprise visits of members of the Royal family to Stanley Woolston's antiques shop which attracted large crowds of spectators. But the biggest surprise was in 1934 when Queen Mary arrived, not in a limousine but in an ordinary private car. The Royal vehicle had broken down and passing motorist, Percy Titmous had stopped to offer her a lift!

Alongside the Cambridge Daily News was the New Theatre established by William Beales Redfern on the site of a skating rink. It opened in 1896 with a performance of Hamlet intended to signify that this new enterprise was a serious form of entertainment at a time when the University still had powers to licence theatres and traditionally did not allow them to operate during term time. Redfern took stringent action against undergraduates who disrupted performances, ordering the house lights to be put up and the young men expelled, but then found that they stopped coming to his theatre. As the century progressed the theatre alternated stage shows with variety entertainments and films before closing in March 1956. The building was demolished 1960 and block offices erected on the site. [SCAN 9851 NEW THEATRE AND CDN BUILDING c1960 TAKE MODERN VIEW MODERN OFFICES]

Emmanuel College was founded in the reign of Queen Elizabeth I to prepare men for the church; it became a principal centre for Protestantism and in the religious upheavals of the 1630s many of its students emigrated to America including John Harvard, benefactor of Harvard University. The St Andrew's Street frontage was rebuilt in 1770, previous its main entrance had been in Emmanuel Street. In an early example of road planning Cambridge Town Council held discussions with the College in 1900 about closing Emmanuel Street and constructing a new road further north to relieve traffic congestion. The College demolished houses on the north side of the street and built a new wing only for the Council to change its mind. Instead they paid for an underpass linking the still-separated areas of college.

In 1949 work started on the demolition of property at the junction of Emmanuel Street in order to widen the junction with St Andrew's Street. It was followed by plans for the erection of new offices and shops including car parking either in an underground garage or on the roof. The resultant development was hailed as a successful piece of town planning sufficiently modern to introduce a mid 20th-century element but not so outrageously contemporary to look incongruous.

But to make space for the new development old buildings had to be swept away. They included Rance's Folly, a mansion built in 1850s by Alderman Henry Rance with several lifts, a ballroom, four bathrooms, central heating and a swimming pool. It was even said that guests played tennis on the roof of the house. Sadly the Alderman, twice mayor, practically ruined himself in the process. [SCAN RANCES FOLLY – TAKE MODERN VIEW LOOKING N FROM EMMANUEL STREET]

More buildings were lost with the creation of Bradwell's Court, Cambridge's first shopping arcade which opened in 1960. It was a joint venture between two colleges - Jesus and Christ's and provided a continuous covered walkway from Drummer Street bus station to the city centre with 20 new shops and showrooms. It was designed by the Cambridge architects, Hughes and Bicknell who took special care that the scheme harmonised with the adjoining college buildings. Now it has been condemned as '1960s tat' and there are plans to redevelop it once more, perhaps re-opening Christ's Lane alongside.

Christ's College was founded as God's House near Clare College but had to move when King Henry VI wanted that site and was renamed when Henry VII granted them a new charter and named his mother, Lady Margaret Beaufort as its foundress. It has a most decorative gateway similar to that of another of Lady Margaret's foundations, St John's. [SCAN 8883 – CHRISTS COLLEGE ON RIGHT, c1900 TAKE MODERN VIEW]

Opposite stands the church of St Andrew the Great, a building dating back to 1842 but containing a memorial to Captain James Cook relocated from the previous church on the site. It was thoroughly renovated in June 1904: the congregation sat within spotless walls, under a roof which afforded no resting place for the busy manufacturer of webs and in an atmosphere suggestive of spring cleaning. The dignified furniture shines anew, the walls are nicely painted and distempered, the windows (coloured and plain) admit the full quota of light. Gas has given way to electric light and there is a sermon switch which will turn off the current from two-thirds of the lights, the News reported. But congregations declined and for a while the church was officially declared redundant with proposals for it to be made into shops or a civic restaurant as part of the redevelopment for the Lion Yard shopping area which opened in 1974. Now there are plans for yet further change with a Grand Arcade destined to link Lion Yard with Downing Street.

The new development will see a new store for what is regularly named as Cambridge's favourite shop. Robert Sayle opened a shop in 1840 selling linen drapery, silk mercery, hosiery, haberdashery and straw bonnets. It had style: in the 1920s senior saleswomen and women buyers wore long silk or satin gowns, often with a train to give added dignity; men wore black suits with frock coats for seniors, stiff white collars and cuffs to shirts and black ties. Directors, shopwalkers and senior buyers used to wear shining top hats as they moved round the store. Then, as now, shopworkers had problems finding accommodation so Sayles established a hostel in the upper storeys of building with a reading room with daily and weekly newspapers. Back in 1922 Mr Chaplin a veteran governing director reminisced how in the 'good old days' things had been very different. Business hours used to be much longer, they had no Bank Holidays and no half-holidays except one and that was Flower Show day when they closed at four o'clock. "Men could do a good deal more work then than many of us can do today", he commented. What would he have said about modern shopping trends which continue to move towards seven-day, open-all-hours trading once more. [SCAN 9935 CEN PHOTO OF SAYLES 1970s – TAKE MODERN VIEW]

But history has a habit of repeating itself. Once the Post Office stood on the corner of Post Office Terrace, then it was relocated to the corner of Petty Cury before moving to its present site in 1934.

And redevelopment too has a habit of repeating itself as the buildings at the junction with Downing Street show. The Bird Bolt Inn had stood on the site for hundreds of years until the site was acquired by the Norwich Union Insurance Society who in 1907 erected a modern imposing new building for the new century. But by 1972 what had once been the last word in prestige office layout was condemned as wasteful of space both for heating and lighting as well as working and permission was obtained for its demolition. In its place arose a modern new block of shops and offices which are themselves to change yet again for the new Grand Arcade. [SCAN 6806 BIRD BOLT HOTEL, 8884 NORWICH UNION BUILDING, TAKE CURRENT PHOTO, FIND IMPRESSION OF GRAND ARCADE PLAN]

But one thing does seem to be clear - the days of traffic congestion have gone forever. No longer will the News report a solicitor's plea: "I feel it is only a matter of time before every motorist in Cambridge comes to court because he is forced to leave his car somewhere. The parking situation is a nightmare". He was appearing on behalf of a motorist summoned for causing a motor car to wait in St Andrew's Street for longer than the permitted 15 minutes. The date: 1950. [SCAN 9572 TRAFFIC CONDITIONS 1950]

That was in the good old days when you could actually drive down St Andrew's Street and park beside the road as you did your shopping. Perhaps you remember them?

The strange story of the Monks' Pipe and Hobson's River, by Mike Petty

Cambridge owes its existence to the river that embraces it and the bridge that spanned it. It supplied the town with a defence, with a major trading artery, with a sewer and a source of water for everyday life.

But you would not really want to drink it.

Before the coming of the colleges Cambridge was already home to a number of religious houses. One of these was a Franciscan Friary on the site of the present Sidney Sussex College in Sidney Street. The monks were some way from the river but they needed something to drink.

They first laid a stone channel to bring water from the fields out at Barnwell but this soon proved inadequate. So in 1325 they decided to construct a pipeline to bring a supply of clean drinking water from a place called Bradrusshe on the Madingley Road. Here a number of springs come to the surface which they channelled to a conduit head. Their small oblong building constructed of large blocks of stone still stands in the corner of a garden behind a house in Conduit Head Road. [TAKE PICTURE OF CONDUIT HEAD – NEED TO PHONE Lady Sylvia Lachmann, Conduit Head, 36 Conduit Head Road – 354433 AS IT'S APPROACHED THROUGH HER GARDEN]

The monks negotiated with seventeen different owners to buy up a long strip of land, two feet wide and over 5,500 feet long and dug a trench through the fields, crossing the river near Garret Hostel Island before continuing down a street called King's Childer Lane to their friary.

In it they laid lead pipes to carry the water to their home. Whenever the aqueduct required repair they dug up the ground above it, making great openings in the streets and lanes to the annoyance of travellers. It was a mighty undertaking but it was worth it for they had water which they shared with the townsfolk. For more than a century all was well.

However in 1209 following disturbances in Oxford, scholars had started to arrive in Cambridge and soon began to build colleges so they could live and work together.

One of these was King's Hall, on the site of part of the present Trinity College. As it expanded in 1433 so it took in King's Childer Lane and the pipe that had ran down the lane now crossed the centre of their new court. Scholars also need water so they asked permission to take some out of the pipe, it would not affect the Friars, they claimed, and should the pipe break under their ground the college would repair it.

But the Friars were unhappy with the idea and the disputes that followed had finally to be resolved by seeking the judgement of the King. The result was unsurprising: the college got their water and when Henry VIII abolished the friary in 1538 he granted the watercourse in its entirety to Trinity College.

The scholars used the water in their college kitchen but in 1601 the College decided to invest some money on an ornate stone fountain employing the skills of the finest craftsmen to carve various beasts to decorate it. When King James I visited the college in 1615 it was repaired and repainted to be ready for his admiration. But the fountain was poorly constructed and extensive repairs were needed in 1661-2 and 1672-3; despite these in 1716 it had to be completely rebuilt by Robert Gumbold; the work took 25 weeks and cost £183 13s. 6.

The old fountain was sketched by David Loggan for his Cantabrigia Depicta issued in 1688. Comparison with the existing structure shows that the original octagonal base used to have four steps instead of the present three. The crowns of the arches were ornamented with lions' heads instead of human faces while the lion on the summit had a metal crown and tongue and bore a weathercock. The whole structure was painted, probably for preservation of stonework, with some gilt decorations. Most importantly it had taps for water on all eight sides instead of only one as at present. [SCANS OF LOGGAN DRAWING OF FOUNTAIN 1688 AND

Despite the rebuild another repair was needed 50 years later which was nearly as extensive as the previous one. The steps had to be replaced in 1821 and in the 1840s all the pipes were repaired and renewed.

But the fountain was more than an ornament. In 1656 the college ordered the porter to make sure the pipes ran constantly and to keep watch on any college servant who tried to sell the water to townsfolk. Despite this by 1713 many Cambridge people were reported to be using its excellent water for making tea and today there is a public tap outside the Great Gate – but with a notice warning the water is not to be used for drinking. [TAKE MODERN PICTURE OF THE TAP ON LEFT OF TRINITY COLLEGE GREAT GATE]

Hobson's Conduit

The absence of clean drinking water came to prominence in 1574 while Cambridge was enduring one of several recurring bouts of plague. Andrew Perne, Master of Peterhouse and Vice Chancellor of the University had no doubts as to the reason: "Our synnes is the principle cause; the other, as I conjecture, is the corruption of the King's Ditch"

The King's Ditch was an open watercourse that ran round the eastern side of Cambridge, starting at the Cam near Quayside, continuing across the Franciscan Friar's site, down the present Hobson Street, across the current Lion Yard and along Mill Lane back to the river. It had been conceived as a defence by Henry III back in 1267 but soon became more of an open sewer.

Perne suggested that Vicar's Brook, a natural stream running from the south of Cambridge, should be diverted to flow into the ditch so as to flush it out. But the scheme was put on the back burner. The idea was revived in 1607 by James Montagu, master of Sidney Sussex College, inheritors of the Friar's site. They were by then finding the stinking ditch across their gardens to be particularly offensive. It was so bad he was prepared to give 100 marks of his own money to get the work started.

A consortium of both University and townspeople was put together in a scheme for their common good. The plan was to construct a three-mile watercourse to bring water from a series of natural springs at Nine Wells in the parish of Gt Shelford. They would use the natural watercourse of the Vicar's Brook as a base but then divert the water down a one-mile long man-made canal and along the middle of Trumpington Street to the gateway of Pembroke College where it would flow into the King's Ditch. [COLOUR PRINT OF WATER FLOWING DOWN EACH SIDE OF STREET NEAR PEMBROKE COLLEGE 1814]

After all their efforts it seems the new water had little effect. Within a few years the King's Ditch was being filled in and by 1810 had virtually disappeared from the map altogether. But the pure water was too good to waste. A Conduit Head was constructed at the corner of Lensfield Road where the main watercourse terminated in an artificial pond. Some water continued down Trumpington Street though in the 1790s it was diverted from the centre of the road to runnels on either side. [COLOUR PICTURES IN NEWS FILES 'CAMBRIDGE. HOBSONS CONDUIT']

Two other underground channels were added. One branch was constructed in 1631 along Lensfield Road, Regent Terrace and St. Andrew's Street before splitting into two runs. One fed ponds at Emmanuel College before continuing under the present Drummer Street to Christ's where it provided water for the college swimming pool. Another continued down St.

Andrew's Street where the water flow along either side of the road before finally going underground near the corner of Hobson Street – part of the original King's Ditch.

An earlier spur had been laid in 1614 to bring water to the town centre. It ran down Tennis Court Road (where it was later diverted to serve the laundry of Addenbrooke's Hospital), then over the corner of a field owned by Thomas Hobson (now the University Downing Site), across St Andrews Hill to Guildhall Place and finally Market Hill.

Here a conduit was erected by Henry King and Nathaniel Cradock. The cost was to be met jointly by the University and Town but by 1620 many of the townsfolk had not paid their share, leaving the men out of pocket to the tune of about £100. They complained to the King who wrote to the Vice Chancellor and Mayor urging them to ensure proper steps were taken to defray the costs and keep the works in good repair.

Ten years later both Town and Gown mourned the death of one of Cambridge's greatest characters, Thomas Hobson. He had succeeded to his father's carriers business conveying goods and letters to and from London before recognising the potential of hiring horses to the many undergraduates who would otherwise have the expense of maintaining their own animals. His insistence that the animals were taken out in rotation – you took the next one in line or none at all – brought the phrase 'Hobson's Choice' into the language. But in Cambridge he was equally famous for two endowments. The first was the establishment of a workhouse where the poor could earn a living through spinning yarn. But it was his second that ensured his immortality. [SCAN OF HOBSON]

In his will in 1631 he specified that the income from several acres of land at 'Swinescroft' should be used to maintain the Conduit. But Hobson also added another £10 so that the top of the conduit might be made half a yard higher, or more if it might be conveniently done. This addition transformed the appearance of the original relatively plain conduit and an inscription in his memory was added to it. This was his only memorial stone, there being none to mark his burial place in the chancel of St Bene't's church. But it ensured that his name would be linked not only to the fountain but to the whole scheme, whilst those who actually carried it into fruition are largely forgotten. [SCAN OF PRINT OF CONDUIT ON MARKET HILL 1838]

Indeed when a memorial was finally erected at the source of the water at Nine Wells in 1861 one of the names of the actual benefactors was misspelled. Along with Andrew Perne, James Montagu, Thomas Chaplin, Stephen Perse, Joseph Merrill – and Hobson – was that of Edward Potts, actually Potto, a butcher who had been one of those who had supervised the building of the conduit. [SCAN OF MONUMENT AT NINE WELLS, ANOTHER IN CEN LIBRARY 'CAMBRIDGE. HOBSON'S STREAM']

The Market Hill conduit was further embellished following the restoration of King Charles II to the throne. The Civil War had been a difficult time in Cambridge with the town supporting Parliament whilst the University and Colleges had favoured the Royal cause. With the King returned the town council thought it prudent to demonstrate their loyalty and in 1661 ordered the Royal arms to be added to the conduit. Ten years later the King visited Cambridge and as he passed the Conduit, which was made to run red with claret wine, he expressed himself well pleased with it. It was something that had been seen ten years earlier for his coronation and was to be repeated for the visits of King William III in 1689 and Queen Anne in 1705

But by the 1830s the Conduit was often out of order and incapable of supplying the needs of the inhabitants. There was no actual shortage of water – streams of it ran away in different directions - but the Conduit itself would not even drip. The old leaden pipes were corroded and were replaced by iron pipes to restore the supply.

For nearly 200 years the Conduit stood on the corner of the Market, witnessing the daily activities at the stalls which were arranged in front of the Guildhall and in four lines from Petty Cury to Market Street. Between them and Great St Mary's church were a block of shops with a narrow lane, Pump Lane, separating them from others that backed up to the churchyard. [COLOUR VIEW OF MARKET SHOWING CONDUIT, 1830S]

But then in September 1849 fire broke out in a drapers shop and flames spread rapidly from one building to another; their colour changing as the chemicals at Orridge's chemist caught fire to be followed by the paints at Modens and then the newly-laid gas main fractured. There was a grave danger it would leap Pump Lane to the church beyond. The call went out for the various fire engines; the first to arrive made their way to the water supply - Hobson's conduit. But the railings were locked and they had to find the man with the key to open it up, then they squabbled as to who should have rights to the water while a chain of people ferried buckets of water hand to hand from the river. By hard work - and much luck - the morning found only part of the centre razed to the ground, though many other properties were badly damaged. [SCAN OF ROWLANDSON PRINT OF MARKET HILL BEFORE FIRE SHOWING HOUSES ON RIGHT AND CONDUIT IN BACKGROUND]

Faced with the devastation of the town centre the town council was forced to consider come action. As men began to clear away the rubble so a seemingly endless round of debates, discussions, arguments and negotiations began. The council finally decided to pull down the remaining properties and construct a new larger Market Square. Pump Lane disappeared, Great St Mary's church gained extra ground, St Mary's Passage was widened, the site levelled and the Hill disappeared [COLOUR PRINT OF MARKET SQUARE AFTER FIRE]

It was not the end of the debate: the old Hobson's Conduit now on the corner of the new Square was considered too antiquated a structure in those forward-looking times. For Cambridge now had a new source of water with the establishment of the Cambridge University and Town Waterworks Company. Various designs were suggested but the preferred scheme was for an ornate fountain under a high stone canopy right in the centre. But the design was not appreciated by all: the Athenaeum commented "the new structure is a failure; it appears short and clumsy and the gables and pinnacles have a dwarfish appearance ..." [COLOUR PRINT OF THE NEW FOUNTAIN DESIGN].

The work was put out to tender – but nobody wanted the job. Things stagnated; people complained of bungling and delays. A correspondent to the Cambridge Chronicle of 8th September 1855 lamented: "it is currently reported that the Town Council intended to erect the new Conduit out of the stones of Sebastopol ... and they are waiting for its capture to get the supply of granite".

Next week Sebastopol fell to the British and French besieging armies in the Crimean war – noted for the charge of the Light Brigade the year previously. Crowds flocked on to Market Square, fireworks were let off and squibs and rockets bounced about for several hours. Work started in earnest next week on preparing the site and the building of the Fountain itself commenced during the winter weather of November and December. It was soon obvious that something was wrong; by May 1856 the new masonry had already become loose "and unless something be immediately done it is evident that the top of the conduit will speedily tumble down"

The criticisms were justified; just as with the original Trinity Fountain the workmanship was poor and the stone soon started to decay. By 1953 the ornate canopy was in a dangerous condition; it would cost £2,000 to repair and was just not worth the expense of restoration. [SCAN OF ARTICLE ON BEHEADING 1953]

Some of the crumbling stone figures, including that of Thomas Hobson, were taken to the Folk Museum for preservation. In their century on the Market Hill they witnessed coronations, celebrations, undergraduate rags and war. The stately structure had endeared itself to generations of market goers but now it was removed, leaving just the base and fountain head. This itself is no longer fed by water from the conduit, the link having been severed during the construction of Lion Yard. [TAKE MODERN PICTURE OF MARKET HILL FOUNTAIN]

But what was to happen to the old Hobson's Conduit? Alderman Foster Finch, sometime Mayor of Cambridge, agitated for somewhere to put it and launched a collection ensure its repair. By July 1856 it was in its new position at the head of the watercourse that formerly fed it and its reopening was witnessed by a gathering of its supporters. [PHOTO OF CEREMONY AT LENSFIELD ROAD]. An inscription was added to the Conduit to celebrate the munificence of Thomas Hobson, further ensuring his posterity. [PHOTO OF STONE MASON RECARVING SOME OF THE DECORATIONS OF THE CONDUIT - (DATE UNCERTAIN)]

As the replacement fountain in the centre of the Market Hill has decayed so from time to time plans have been produced for something else to replace it; there have even been proposals for a new fountain. Some people have suggested once more reinstating Hobson's Conduit in the centre of the city. Perhaps one day, as envisaged by a poet back in 1856,

“... the glory of my fame
Will shine upon the Market Hill again”

The Fountain Society will be holding their Annual Conference at St Catharine's College, Cambridge on 11th and 12th September 2004 when Mike Petty will be lecturing on 'Hobson's Conduit and other Cambridge water features'

Bridge Street, by Mike Petty

Cambridge's Bridge Street is one that has changed dramatically within living memory, though some parts would be familiar to the passengers who once arrived by stagecoach at one of the great Cambridge inns, the Hoop Hotel. It was mentioned by the poet William Wordsworth in 'The Prelude, a record of his life in Cambridge from 1789 to 1791:

Onward we drove beneath the Castle; caught
While crossing Magdalene Bridge, a glimpse of Cam;
And at the Hoop alighted, famous Inn.

The Hoop was built in about 1729 and amongst those who found shelter within its walls was one of the most famous of Cambridge characters. Jemmy Gordon combined great learning with a great propensity to drink, a memory that could recall the slightest transgressions of the most important folk and a mouth that had no hesitation in sharing them with the world. No wonder constables and magistrates preferred to ignore him. Jemmy lived not in the hotel itself but in the stables at the back until one night, returning drunk as usual, he lost his footing on the ladder that led to his loft and broke his shoulder. Today ancient oaths and declamations can still be heard in the area – but now they come from the stage of the ADC which has replaced the inn's private theatre. Fittingly the Hoop had a dramatic end; it was bought by man anxious to close it down since he felt it was blighting the careers of too many undergraduates. Then when renovations were taking place in 1910 workmen found a human skeleton concealed beneath the wall of the wine cellar. Now the upper rooms have been transformed again by Trinity College to provide accommodation for its students. [SCAN 7938 - BILL FROM HOOP HOTEL 1829; PHOTO OF STREET IN 1960s; TAKE MODERN EQUIVALENT]

Across the road were a number of shops including Gallyons the gunsmiths whose technicians had a tendency to adjust the sights of their bespoke sporting rifles by aiming at the ladies in the jewellers shop opposite. It closed in 1982 after 198 years in Cambridge. Nearby Thomas Stearn the photographer specialised in University sporting pictures. During the Second World War they moved their processing department to Brighouse near Leeds from which a large number of glass plate negatives taken at that time were retrieved by the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard library. Sadly these are the only negatives that seem to have survived, thousands of others being dumped after the firm closed in the 1970s. The move was prompted by the bombing raids on Cambridge one of which in 1942 sent shrapnel flying through the air and scarring the walls of Whewell's Court opposite the junction with Jesus Lane. [TAKE MODERN VIEW FROM JESUS LANE LOOKING AT BUILDINGS ON LEFT HAND SIDE]

The force of the blast was taken by the Union Society building just behind the Round Church. This is the University's debating chamber and was patched up in time to become a base from which Generals Montgomery and Eisenhower planned part of the D-Day invasion of 1944. It was not enemy bombers but Cambridge planners who were responsible for the most dramatic changes in Bridge Street. As the town sought to cope with the increase in motor traffic after the First World War it was obvious that something needed to be done. The solution seemed obvious; widen the main road into the town centre by demolishing the old buildings alongside it. This solution also accorded with St John's College's plans for addition facilities and the die was cast. [COLOUR SCAN 7370 C1905 - SCAN 10436 STREET WITH TRAFFIC LIGHTS 1937 - TAKE MODERN EQUIVALENT].

Some antiquarians bemoaned the disappearance of some of the older buildings, in particular the former Old Red Lion which Dick Turpin is said to have frequented. But they could not be allowed to stand in the way of progress and the site was cleared to be replaced by St John's college music school and student rooms. The demolition saw the end of several old yards which had provided homes for generations of residents but Warren's Yard and Sussum's Yard, one of whose premises included a fine carved oak mantelpiece that had once graced St John's Combination Room passed largely unrecorded into the history books. [SCAN 10437 FRONT OF THE DEMOLISHED PROPERTIES]

The similar old, out of date and worn-out 16th-century buildings across the road near the corner with Round Church Street survived in their run-down state until the Second World War was over. But by 1967 they were just a decayed shell and plans were announced to replace them with a supermarket. Although these were rejected, so too were recommendations that the structure be preserved. "The sooner we get the bulldozers in, the better" said one councillor. Various proposals were put forward for the crumbling buildings to be pulled down for a shopping, parking and residential complex but these brought protests from the Cambridge Preservation Society. Finally they were declared of Historic Interest and not to be demolished. It was agreed that there could be redevelopment, but it must retain the historic frontage. In August 1975 scaffolding went up around the surviving facades as behind mechanical diggers began excavating foundations for an office complex that would be built, almost unseen, at the back. Today it is hailed as one of the successes of modern architecture, and has won a Civic Trust award. Yet the pictures in the News files reveal just how run-down they had become and how nearly the city lost one of its architectural gems. If conservationists feel like a drink to celebrate then they have several pubs to chose from. The Mitre serves Benskin's beer at 48p a pint – or at least it did back in February 1981! Between it and The Baron of Beef next door were twelve houses in Blackamoor Head Yard. Some were damaged when in 1933 one of the fiercest fires in Cambridge for years raged through the site partially destroying the Baron, which had been rebuilt only the year before at a cost of between £4,000 and £5,000. Something of the atmosphere of old Cambridge can be found in streets around St Clement's Church. But pictures showing Norman Bradley's pawnbrokers shops on the corner of Thompson's Lane is a reminder that not everybody could or can afford the expense of life in central Cambridge. In the 1920s old ladies used to take in their corsets on Monday mornings only to retrieve them the next Friday ready for church on Sunday – something that no longer happens (presumably)!. But looking along Quayside from Magdalene Bridge it is hard to recall just how much this area has changed in the last few years. This was the hard-working port area where barges unloaded wood, breweries produced beer and an electricity generating station chimney spewed smoke into the atmosphere. Its transformation into the cosmopolitan riverside area of today is a reminder that not everything was better in the 'good old days' ["A GLIMPSE OF CAM" - SCAN 9110 OF QUAYSIDE AND SNOW 1963 – TAKE MODERN EQUIVALENT]

Grand designs, new beginnings by Mike Petty

Shopping in Cambridge city centre has entered a new phase with the closure of Robert Sayle's store in St Andrew's Street. Now another famous name that has served generations of Cambridge folk, and is regularly cited as the city's favourite shop, has become just a memory, like Eaden Lilley, Joshua Taylor and even Woolworths.

Robert Sayle had opened his store in St Andrews Street back in March 1840 with a stock consisting of linen drapery, silk mercery, hosiery, haberdashery and straw bonnets. Then he was in competition with Mr William Eaden Lilley who sold drapery, floor coverings and soft furnishings from a small shop in Market Street. They were joined by a third store that of Joshua Taylor who had set up in Ely before moving to Sidney Street Cambridge in 1860, expanding into Market Street in 1900; their stock consisted of working men's clothing, smocks, cord knee breeches and moleskin trousers. Each store developed and expanded despite the difficulties of trading in a town where shops existed to serve the University and virtually closed down at the end of term.

After the Great War came a period of massive expansion in Cambridge shopping. Old buildings in Sidney Street were ripped down to make way for a new Boots development on one side, with Sainsbury's followed by Woolworths and Marks and Spencer on the other. The arrival of such large stores attracted shoppers into the centre of Cambridge, their numbers swelled by the creation of a new large bus station in Drummer Street.

Meanwhile another shopping revolution had been taking place in the Fitzroy Street, Burleigh Street area where numerous small shops existed to serve the resident community. In 1883 Laurie & McConnell opened a shop in Fitzroy Street; they suffered a disastrous fire in 1903 but rebuilt a magnificent new store which they expanded along the street as the century developed. The shop sold everything from clothing to furnishing, fabric, hardware, china and gardening implements. They were joined by the Co-operative Society who moved into new premises in Burleigh Street in 1900 and together they attracted shoppers from around the region, as well as from the town centre.

But by the 1950s planners were concerned about the viability of the Cambridge shopping scene and plans were canvassed for a new shopping development – but was it to be in the Fitzroy Street or Petty Cury areas? The decision was finally made in favour of the town centre and ancient buildings and lanes were ripped down for the Lion Yard precinct which opened in 1974. It brought more nationally-known names into Cambridge as well as providing space for local fashion shops such as the Alley Boutique, Cambridge's answer to Carnaby Street, but many complained that the rents were too high at a period when the three Rs – rents, rates and recession took their toll. Many of the older-established firms such as Bacons the tobacconists, Pigotts tools, Barretts china and numerous tailors closed or moved away to be replaced by more national stores or Building Societies.

But the planners had not finished; now one centre was complete they turned their eyes on the East Road area as well where many of the properties were in poor condition. For years the arguments raged as both Laurie and McConnell and the Co-op expanded and modernised. In 1974 the plans envisaged a new store for the John Lewis organisation, parent group of Robert Sayle. But nothing was clear and with no firm plans the area deteriorated, parking restrictions were introduced and finally Laurie could wait no longer. In 1977 they announced their closure blaming indecision over the Kite redevelopment. Almost immediately plans for the Grafton centre were confirmed.

In recent years the Grafton has been expanded and concern has been voiced again about the viability of the city centre shopping where both Eaden Lilley and Joshua Taylor have moved away. Now in a new leap of faith there is to be more new development, a Grand Arcade to span the area from Lion Yard to Downing Street. But to make space the old Robert Sayle store has to go. They have found a new temporary home – on the site of the old Co-op building in Burleigh Street – from which they will return to their original place in the heart of central Cambridge. It will not be the same shop, it may not be the same name, but the spirit of Robert Sayle is due to return to its ancestral home.

Poppy Day in Cambridge by Mike Petty

On Armistice Sunday throughout Cambridgeshire men and women who have now grown old will prepare to commemorate once more those who did not. They will make their way to a church or chapel to remember again those people who to many are just names. Then will come the procession to a war memorial to lay their wreaths of poppies.

The old soldiers will not be alone; they will be joined by younger folk who have grown up in times of comparative peace. But could the young be trusted to observe the occasion in the right manner – this was the question being asked in the 1920s.

For some years after the end of the Great War Cambridge authorities refused to allow the British Legion to arrange a collection on behalf of Earl Haig's appeal for distressed men and the devastated areas. It was felt to be too dangerous.

Undergraduate 'rags' had become too boisterous, especially those around Bonfire Night. November had become a public nuisance, policemen were continually attacked and to hold a Poppy Day collection that month would be asking for trouble. It could too easily become the occasion for unseemly behaviour between the undergraduates and the poppy sellers.

Armistice Day, 1921, was the 'Great Gun Day'. During the night of November 10th a band of Gonville and Caius College men removed one of the German guns then displayed at Jesus College. They slid it onto a trolley and through a section of railings before dragging it down Victoria Avenue, Chesterton Lane and Bridge Street into the court of Gonville and Caius college where it was found next morning.

Then a few days later the Cambridge newspapers carried a letter from a member of Caius College. It was from Colonel F. Stratton the Chairman of the Cambridge branch of the British Legion. He reported that together with an undergraduate society he had approached the police, the Watch Committee and the Vice Chancellor of the University to ask permission to organise a Poppy Day collection. This had been agreed and the first collection would be held on Saturday 26th November 1921. They had also suggested that next year this collection should be organised entirely by undergraduates who would take full responsibility that there would be no incidents. In another extraordinary act of faith this too had been allowed.

But there was another, more important, event in the pipeline. And it was one almost ruined by the non-appearance of an undergraduate – though it was not his fault.

In September 1920 a meeting of the Cambridgeshire Joint War Memorial Committee had agreed the erection of a memorial statue at the corner of Station Road, Cambridge.

A Canadian sculptor, Tait McKenzie was commissioned. He suggested the figure of a private soldier in full kit, striding along bareheaded, helmet in hand. A German helmet would be strung on his back as a trophy, partly concealed by a laurel wreath carelessly flung over his rifle barrel. In his hand he would hold a rose while another rose thrown to him had fallen to the ground. His head would be turned to the side, his expression alert and happy, and his lips slightly parted as if he had recognised an old friend in the crowd. As he glanced over his shoulder he would look down Station Road from which he left for the war. But now he would be at peace, for the statue was of The Homecoming.

McKenzie needed a model and found one in a Christ's College undergraduate, Kenneth Hamilton.

The sculptor worked feverishly trying to get the design just as he wanted it. In his studios at the University of Pennsylvania he was working constantly, inviting artist friends to comment and criticise. At last he was ready. The mould for the statue was complete, it just need to be shipped to England.

The day for the memorial's unveiling had been set for July 3rd 1922. The Duke of York, who was in Cambridge to open the Royal Show at Trumpington, would perform the ceremony. The plinth was erected, the crowds anticipated.

But there was a problem. The boat carrying the statue delayed and could not be there in time. The Committee was faced with a dilemma. They could not unveil a statue that was not there – or could they. They decided on a subterfuge. A plaster cast of the statue was erected and painted to look like bronze. Then they prayed that it would not rain – for that might dissolve the paint - and that the wind would not blow and the covering canvas rub out essential details. But it rained and blew. However nobody noticed and in the presence of thousands of people The Homecoming was unveiled.

Then ten days later a lorry drew up with the proper figure. The copy was taken down and for a while Cambridge had two war memorials – though not identical, for the sculptor had made slight changes once he'd seen the figure in place.

Four months later the first Poppy Day Rag came into being when on 15th November 1922 a circus of weird animals emerged from the yard of the Castle Hotel in St Andrew's Street. They included a costermonger's cart, an elephant, a jester and Tishy the kangaroo who curtsied for every penny thrown. The circus was a screamingly funny affair and brought everyone to doorways, windows and, in some cases, roof tops. The procession was in Downing Street when the signal for the two minutes Armistice silence was heard and immediately the procession pulled up. The two minutes over the pandemonium started as suddenly as it had ceased. They toured the town with a police escort and raised £120 13s. It was hailed as a rag that everybody could enjoy; it did no harm to anybody and above all it aided "Poppy Day" to the sum of £123 13s.

It was to be fore runner for many more. Next year the paper reported that the red poppy of Remembrance was everywhere in Cambridge. Every buttonhole, every bicycle, and every motor car bore visible tribute to those who died that England might live. Everywhere there were busy undergraduates smiling and pushing their business and selling red silk poppies in aid of the Earl Haig's Fund for ex-servicemen and their dependants. The rags continued with parades and decorated floats until the 1960s. But then some colleges began to boycott the event and people became less tolerant of flour bombs, rotten tomatoes, water pistols and eggs. In 1967 the 'Poppy Day' rag was held for the last time. Although the rag was revived in 1969 it was held in February, not November and the link with Poppy Day was broken.

Collections however continue to be made and the number of poppies visible in the streets on the approach to Armistice Day proves that our appreciation of the sacrifices made by those who fought and died – as well as those who returned to rebuild their lives – is not forgotten.

And as the old soldiers stand proudly at the Cambridge war memorial on the corner of Station Road the face of a Cambridge undergraduate will be looking down on them.

Bonfire night in Cambridge by Mike Petty

The Government clampdown on fireworks has been welcomed by those of us who no longer appreciate the bangs and whizzes in what now seems late into the night. Yet such efforts to restrain exuberant youths have been going on far before any of us were born – and in the days when we were young things were much more exciting than now.

Cambridge newspapers have been reporting the same things for year after year as these summaries will show

1786

Bonfire Night was celebrated in the usual manner with squibs, crackers, rioting and mischief to the personal injury of many and the great danger of the inhabitants in general. We wish housekeepers would unite with magistrates to suppress this dangerous nuisance and as caution every person who makes or sells any squibs, crackers, serpents or other fireworks is liable to a penalty of £5.

1791

In Norwich a man was fined £1 for throwing squibs in their Market Place and another to one month's hard labour in the bridewell for throwing fire balls. A few such examples in Cambridge would be of public utility

1808

A young man detected throwing squibs on Cambridge market hill was made to offer the donation of one guinea to Addenbrooke's Hospital or be prosecuted

1810

Following an accident at a house where fireworks were sold the magistrates have determined to suppress the unlawful practice of letting off fireworks

1816

Constables were stationed to enforce this ruling but many people assembled on Parker's Piece and Midsummer Green. Two boys were so much hurt it is expected they will lose their sight.

1838

Five youths and one girl who were charged with disorderly conduct and exciting the mob to riot on the night of November 5th were admonished and discharged

1859

It had seemed that the regular manifestations of detestation of of popery and popish plots - by punching each other's heads and blacking each other's eyes - was dying and only exercised by a few shop boys and Barnwell brats following in the wake of a half-dozen gownsmen or kicking a policeman or two. But on Saturday last a party of freshman opened the ball by walking arm-in-arm along the principle streets with defiant expressions on their countenances and their sleeves turned up as if ready for battle. Being Saturday night there was a large number of country lads in town and the boys of Barnwell and other 'scum' - as dirty a mob as one would choose to set eyes on - were soon at the heels of the gownsmen. At first feelings were expressed in groaning or shouting; when the 'gown' turned round the 'cads' ran away shouting 'town'. But soon some Barnwellians of larger growth - whose objects was probably plunder rather than pounding - joined the mob. Skirmishes occurred; sticks were used by both parties & stones thrown by younger boys hit heads of both sides as well as neighbouring windowpanes. The most serious affray was in St John's street where an undergraduate had his arm broken and an innocent passer-by - a Sunday-school teacher - was attacked and taken to hospital. By 10 pm most of the gown party had been sent home by the Proctors but roughs continued to prowl the streets attacking any undergraduate they came across. Police were called and a printer's apprentice was taken to the police station, his companions following throwing stones upon his captors. A large body of policemen were on duty and exerted themselves as much as possible in keeping order. [COLOUR SCAN 'BATTLE' – NB NOT THIS INCIDENT]

1860

No one can doubt that the discontinuance of such observance will do any harm. This year there was no absurd demonstration of foul fighting and cowardice. Undergraduates have come to the conclusion they have something better to do than senselessly parade the streets followed by hooting Barnwell roughs and this year abstained from exciting the mischievous propensities of the hobbledehoy population by appearing in any numbers. Boys had crackers & squibs to themselves. One or two started a fire on Market Hill but it was put out by police.

Even then things were not what they once had been:

The Guy of former years was a figure dressed in modern but seedy clothes, supported on the back of a donkey by some partner of his saddless seat, his arms outstretched to denote the intensity of the torture he had undergone, his gloved hands bearing brimstone matches spread out fanwise to show his diabolical intent; his face red and apoplectic with no nose to speak of, eyes fixed and expressionless complexion highlighted by a large white frill and gigantic paper collar. The Cambridge guy this year was a hollow mockery, attired in a top coat of green paper copiously bedecked with spangles somewhat like a Chinese mandarin and borne on a stretcher. [SCAN 7901- A GUY OF 1933 VINTAGE]

1898

Saturday was a typical "fifth" in Cambridge. Faithfully following the precedent set in former years a number of Varsity men and townspeople assembled in the market place, which for three hours or so was crowded with excitable and pugilistically-inclined youths, representing Town and Gown. The Gown, driven from pillar to post by the howling mob, appeared to be greatly terrified, and despite the vigilance of the police, of whom a large number were told off for special duty, the celebration was not entirely free from violence. Neither town nor gown missed many opportunities of displaying their physical prowess and many are the reports circulated as to the results of the pugilistic

1899

Almost as soon as it was dark a large number of youths made their way to Cambridge Market Hill which was in a short time alive to the crackling and bangings of the smaller fireworks. The 'Varsity', after hall time, joined the townspeople and from eight to eleven there was a roaring, rushing crowd of several hundreds about the hill and neighbouring streets. Certain of the townsmen who had begun the day not to wisely by profusely drinking were responsible for the greater part of the disorder and were seized and marched off by the ever-vigilant gentlemen in blue. [SCAN 9662 – BONFIRE – NOT THIS INCIDENT]

1911

There was a violent battle for the bridge by Jesus Lock. Five PCs successfully resisted the attacks of 300 undergraduates and 'town rowdies'. Stones were thrown. PC Johnson was knocked out and PC Tillet had both heels of his boots torn off. The crowd showed traces of a saving grace for after an appeal by the local superintendent they turned on the stone throwers [SCAN BRIDGE – THIS INCIDENT]

1912

Nov 5th fell on Sunday and it was hoped it would put an end to the bedlam. But gownsmen rioted with equal vigour on both the 4th and 6th. Some raggers surmounted the fence into Newnham college grounds, pulled up the hockey goalposts and prepared a bonfire. The noise they made aroused the College and several of the lady dons and students came out and ran towards the revellers. But police arrived before the Amazons had chance to wreak their revenge. A young gentleman of Trinity college surmounted a human pyramid to reach one of the bracket lamps in Trinity Street. A charge of mounted policemen dispersed the pyramid and the young man remained hanging in mid air until weariness forced him to drop into the midst of a dozen constables waiting below. A 'rescue' cry echoed round Trinity and the gallants did their best but a second charge of mounted police dispersed them. The solitary but unabashed young gentleman was conveyed to the cells under the escort of ten constables on foot with a dozen mounted police strongly protecting the rear and flanks. Their trials plus tribulations were valued next day at a mere one-pound fine [SCAN 7065 – ARREST – NOT THIS INCIDENT]

Cambridge railway station attacked and the platforms flowed white with the upturned churns of the night milk train [SCAN 'STATION' – THIS IS THIS EVENT]

During the blackout of the Great War the tradition was suspended

1915

Cambridge streets were darkened on bonfire night, with strict police supervision - which brought forth some protest by those who have no experience of a Zeppelin raid and the serious catastrophe of being under a rain of bombs from the clouds. In one East Anglian town just to strike a match in the streets was an offence but here in Cambridge there was much abuse of flashlights in the streets after dark - which was asking for trouble

The 1920s' were relatively calm

1922

A lamp-boy from Thoday street, Cambridge was summoned for throwing a firework on Senate House-hill on 4th November and fined one shilling. Ten shillings was the fine imposed upon an undergraduate of Trinity College for a similar offence on Market-hill. Defendant said he did not know they were arresting people for letting fireworks off, or else he would not have been fool enough to do so in front of half the police force. An undergraduate of Corpus Christi who was fined 10s. stated that he came on to the square and saw a lot of police loafing about so he thought he would like to throw some fireworks

1923

Cambridge would be disappointed indeed if the Fifth of November failed to produce a rag of some sort. Last night's effort was, to say the least of it, feeble and was sustained for the most part by such residents of the town as come out for excitement on such occasions, and a handful of very callow freshmen. Fireworks there were in plenty, but the old spirit was lacking. Had it not been for the mounted police and the proctors, the market square would have been its usual desolate self soon after 9.30 pm. It was noticeable that as soon as the mounted police left the crowd decreased by 50 per cent.

During the Second World War the explosions were for real; afterwards it started again

In spite of the fact that there are even fewer fireworks about this year than last, we shall doubtless hear quite a few bangs to-night, organised by those boys whose hours of patient waiting have been rewarded by securing a few of the precious squibs, spinning wheels, golden rain and other varieties which delight both the eye and the ear. The shortage is due to a combination of three things - shortage of paper, labour and fuel, paper being possibly the primary one. The Board of Trade have issued an appeal to the public not to use waste paper and cardboard for November the Fifth bonfires as it goes to make packaging for exports and ceiling boards for new houses

The appeal had little effect

Six undergraduates and two RAF men were arrested during the usual Guy Fawkes Night scenes in the centre of Cambridge last night. From 7.30 crowds grew steadily on Market Hill. Fireworks were discharged freely and the din reached its peak between eight and half-past. Members of the University who earlier had been outnumbered by more than ten to one were out in force by nine o'clock. Several minor scuffles occurred about this time, and the first of several policemen's helmets disappeared. Proctors and their "bulldogs" early kept undergraduates on the move. After that the crowd gradually thinned away, and by 1.15 there were only groups here and there

But the most destructive November 5th was that of 1948. Bonfire damage worse than enemy action during war said the headline in Varsity, the student magazine

By 7pm a big crowd on Market Square was joined by undergraduate men and women wearing gowns for the first time on bonfire night. Lamp standards had been bound with greasy tape to prevent climbers extinguishing the lights – but were themselves set on fire. By 10.30 all lamps had been dealt with and people turned attention to other targets. There were efforts to uproot Belisha beacons and one was pushed through a shop window.

Scores of fireworks and smoke bombs were thrown – some down the underground toilets. Rockets were aimed at the Guildhall clock. The interior of the Senate House was severely damaged by an explosive charge and 70 panes of glass broken. The priceless medieval glass of King's College Chapel narrowly escaped destruction and three motor vehicles were damaged and four constables and at least four civilians were injured. There were eight arrests – five of them undergraduates and 10 people were taken to Addenbrooke's Hospital [SCAN OF VARSITY HEADLINES]

The quietest Guy Fawkes night "rag" long-service Cambridge police officers could remember passed off without even a street lamp being extinguished – another 'within living memory' record. A crowd gathered on the Market Square by 7pm and fireworks were thrown. A police car, which arrived on the scene, radioed for reinforcements. They shepherded the crowd off the square. After that police posted at the entrances to the square prevented people entering the area. Early in the evening a few rotten eggs were thrown, and a smoke bomb exploded in the Sidney Street area. These incidents, and the intermittent throwing of fireworks, constituted about the only 'excitement' of the evening, though there was an occasion when a 'bulldog' pursued a man at full speed in front of the Guildhall.

1950

Although four arrests – three townsmen and one undergraduate – were made, Guy Fawkes night this year was about the quietest since the war. Undergraduates are not as lively as in years past. The reason for the lack of activity on their part was probably the fact that they had been warned verbally by their tutors. Just to make sure seven watchful Proctors with their top-hatted 'bulldogs' maintained a constant patrol of the main streets

Violence flared at the end of the decade:

This was heralded 'the roughest fifth for 20 years' with a pitched barrage of squibs and bangers descending on the crowds. As more and more people came onto Market Hill preliminary skirmishes quickly developed into war on all fronts. Youths poured oil on the water in the fountain and then set it ablaze, the heat was felt by bystanders on the Victoria Cinema pavement. After an hour's bombardment the square was blanketed under a thick pall of sulphurous smoke into which more and more people groped their way. Nearly everyone was caught at one time or another by a squib, many people's clothes were scorched and burnt and several people injured.

Given such horrendous acts the police and university authorities took steps to control the situation, with students being banned from the centre of the city – a ban which was also extended to members of the armed forces.

1962

Police urged people to stay away from the city centre on Guy Fawkes night and the Vice Chancellor announced he had banned all students from the main streets from 7pm till midnight to prevent disturbances which have resulted in injuries to by-standers and passers-by. Groups of policemen equipped with walkie talkie radio sets patrolled the streets and 'moved-on' and groups of people found on corners and in the main streets. It was the quietest for many years.

By 1973 things had become distinctly civilised:

6,000 people turned out to support the second firework spectacular presented by Cambridge Round Table at Cambridge United's Football ground. Hundreds of children were amongst the spectators to watch the £400 firework display. A variety of set pieces, most of which largely featured Catherine wheels won plenty of admiration. Bonfire night in Cambridge was one of the quietest for many years. The Fire Brigade had only one call - and that was a false alarm [FIND MODERN COLOUR PICTURES]

It was an example that has been followed and now thousands flock to organised fireworks spectacles rather than pitched battles in the streets. But way back in 1928 undergraduates had anticipated this possibility with a cartoon in the 'Granta' showing the first squib being lit on Market Hill by the Senior Proctor in front of a cordon of police. It was inconceivable then but today would surprise nobody! [SCAN OF PROCTOR]

The old bonfire nights were 'fun' for some, but terrifying for others. Judi Pollard (nee Moore) recalled: "Living most of our childhood in Sidney Street I remember my father used to take us to a friend's house in Chesterton to share their celebrations. But inevitably we would return home to find Sidney Street blocked off by the police to avoid the Market Square crowd rampaging. On one such occasion my mother, who had stayed in the flat, was bombarded by fireworks being thrown up against our windows. I can remember when in my teens my boyfriend and I crammed on to Market Hill with a few hundred others. Somebody let off something – probably home made – because it was the loudest bang I'd ever heard and the ground actually shook. As a finale to that evening we were then pelted with bags of flour by the people residing in flats over the Milk Bar and other premises on that side of the Square"

But should anybody feel tempted to recreate the madness of past times it might be worth recalling that: "Any person who casts or fires a squib, cracker, serpent or other firework in the public street shall forfeit 20/- or be committed to the House of Correction to hard labour for one month." And when that rule was made in 1786, twenty shillings was a great deal of money!

Cambridgeshire Wartime Christmases 1939-1945 by Mike Petty

War had been declared in September after Germany had invaded Poland; troops had been mobilised and thousands of children evacuated from London and other cities thought liable to be bombed

That December at the time when people's thoughts would normally have been turning to Christmas there were other things to think about such as digging trenches in case of bombing raids and coping with over-enthusiastic special constables on blackout duty. If Father Christmas came this year he'd better dim Rudolph's red nose

The weather was depressing: the sight of birds frozen to trees was not unusual, roads were impassable & trains arrived days, not hours, late. The struggle to keep warm dominated daily life. Knitting had become a major activity producing comforts such as scarves and mittens, gloves and helmets for loved ones in the forces.

In villages parcels were being prepared to sent to for serving men; at Swavesey they contained a Christmas cake, puddings, woolly comforts, chocolates, sweets & tobacco

The problems of war had been brought into focus on November 20th when instructions had been issued to register at a shop for bacon, ham, sugar & butter. Turkeys were scarce so it was mutton pies and Christmas pudding where grated apples or carrots, chopped prunes and dried elderberries replaced dried fruit. Mincemeat became scarce & although it was not yet rationed one shop restricted customers voluntarily to three prunes, four dates, 12 raisins and one ounce of sultanas.

Music shops optimistically suggested buying a piano to raise the blackout gloom & various games like Monopoly, Kan-u-go and jigsaws were being promoted as a way to counter the 'tiresome' current affairs. But Murketts of Huntingdon Toyland had dolls' prams from 6/9 (34p), pedal cars from 5/9 (29p), shove halfpenny boards and train sets Wirelesses were very widely advertised - wireless would bring friends & relatives closer together – and in Cambridge Millers' radio sale meant that a GEC radiogram could be bought for 10gns. It was worth it to hear the broadcast of the Kings College carol service, where candles still burned, despite the blackout - but with dark blank spaces among the rich glory of the stained glass showing where some of the windows had been removed for safety's sake. The outstanding event of the festive season was the King's Christmas broadcast.

Christmas was more solemn than usual. In countless homes the traditional joy and gaiety was tempered by the absence of one or more members of the family. But men of the searchlight units in different parts of Huntingdonshire left their isolated posts on Christmas day to visit the towns where dinners and been arranged with entertainment at the George Hotel, Huntingdon & smaller gatherings in Ramsey & St Neots.

Then there were those who were spending the Christmas in hospitals or institutions. Evacuees from London hospitals outnumbered Cambridge cases almost two to one at Mill Road Infirmary where about 150 people enjoyed the decorated wards, the Salvation army band and roast beef for dinner. At Wisbech there were 180 in the Poor Law Institution where the Mayor and Farther Christmas attended at dinner time. In the Huntingdon Institution 114 inmates shared turkey & pork following by puddings and beer, and each received a present worth 2/7 (13p); but when the Mayor returned to his own home he found it had been ransacked. The Mayoress' hats had been placed on ornaments in the bedrooms, a bottle of whisky emptied and left decorated with a sprig of holly. Somebody evidently had enjoyed a merry time in his absence!

And then there were the evacuees. Although many had travelled back to London for the holiday many others were catered for locally and the Isle of Ely had 7,000 guests in the form of evacuated London schoolchildren spending their first Christmas away from parents and friends. But Santa Claus' address book proved to be a comprehensive volume and contained information of the whereabouts of the thousands of young folk who had left their town addresses and moved into country homes.

By Christmas 1940 France had fallen with the remnants of our army evacuated from Dunkirk & the Home Guard prepared for invasion. Although the Battle of Britain had been won bombing raids had hit Cambridgeshire

Things were not 'as usual' this year as many curtailed festivities to continue the war effort.

Wisbech was happy but quiet and more restrained than normal with many men absent from home. The Corn Exchange was requisitioned for communal feeding as rationing had begun to bite and many families' store cupboards were bare. Bacon, ham & butter were at rate of four ounces per week, eggs were scarce, onions had all but vanished it was an offence to feed birds. Thos Peatling on the Old Market still had some wines but had been hit very hard by depleted transport facilities and budget increases – those of September 1939, April and July 1940 had all added taxes on wine. However you could still get some bargains - Empire wines from Australia at 4/6 (23p) a bottle, Empire brandy at 17/6 (88p) Johncup Scotch whisky a 16/- (80p) or South African sherry, 6/- (30p) But water was more precious than ever and drinkers were urged to use less and not waste a drop.

As for gifts: 'If you must give an Xmas gift - give something practical and British', people were urged. Aldiss of Rose Crescent – 'The brightest shop in Cambridge' - advertised that current stocks were tax free but replacements would be more expensive and have Purchase Tax added. Other shops had blow football for 1/5 (7p), British baby dolls from 2/3 to 9/11 (11p to 49p) and mini clockwork toys, some with electric lights and batteries - including a Vauxhall cabriolet at 1/3

In many places the concern was for the evacuees and others worse off than ourselves. It was no easy task arranging Christmas parties but hard also to dampen the spirit of the season so some activities were arranged with parties in schoolrooms. At Godmanchester £14 had been received from London authorities to be spent on parties for the evacuated children, though some parties – such as that for the Tottenham kids – had to be held over to New Year.

The spirit of Christmas was maintained in the hospitals and institutions though the decorations were less lavish than usual. Addenbrooke's children's ward was in quarantine but Father Christmas arrived anyway and the doors of the Mill Road Infirmary were firmly closed on the war. Although the 146 inmates of St Neots Institution would have only a skeleton of a Christmas even so turkey, beer, sweets and tobacco were on the Christmas day menu together with a concert. The council had voted to open cinemas on Sundays from December to March following a request from the military authorities; the churches had objected but what had churches done for the soldiers? Sundays - and Christmas - marked just part of the utter loneliness of a soldier's life and the only alternative to the cinema was the pub.

In Huntingdon the mayor had appealed for funds for brightening the Christmases of the local men now serving and through many whist drives and dances he was able to send a postal order for 7/6 to all serving men from the town.

But the finest Christmas Box ever was just a card bearing with words "With Love" that was received by Mr & Mrs Lewis of Field Terrace, Ramsey. It had come from their son Owen, a Hurricane pilot in the RAF who had been reported missing on June 9th. For six months the parents had agonised over his possible fate, all hope had been abandoned - until the card arrived just before Christmas!

1941

Air raids had continued and Germany had continued its push into Russia. Then in December Japan launched a surprise attack on Pearl Harbour pitchforking America into the war.

"If Christmas stands for peace on earth how can we keep it when the whole world is engulfed in warfare, countless homes lie shattered, homeless refugees stalk the world and children keep their gas masks handy lest they be choked to death by adults!"

The privations of the year were even worse than expected. The December papers proclaimed "Goodbye to assorted chocolates", the icing of cakes was already illegal and cheese chops and cheese hot pot was being suggested as festive fare. Chivers of Histon cautioned that not many jellies will be available this Christmas so when your grocer has some please let children and invalids have first choice. There will be plenty for everybody when victory is won. There was a revival in trade for wildfowl to replace turkeys with oyster catchers selling at 2/- (10p) a bird, though a Huntingdon man stole five cockerels and was jailed for six months

In spite of restrictions and the grim realities of the third wartime Xmas Wisbech folk contrived to keep the immortal spirit alive. There were far more familiar faces missing, far more men and women away in the services and thoughts of them were uppermost in people's hearts.

A Christmas message was received from London: Christmas is the children's time, it is then more than any other time that every boy and girl wants to be at home with mother and father and taking part with them in the festivities. But London is no place for them. I know many parents during the lulls in bombing have been strongly tempted to bring their boys and girls home from the county - some have rashly done so. This is foolhardy, who knows when Hitler's air attacks will strike into your London homes

Presents were a problem everywhere with production controlled by the Board of Trade. But at Wimpole each child got an apple, bag of raisins and a bun whilst every Gamlingay child received a most valuable present - an egg

The Women's Voluntary Service organised dances with Ken Dale on his accordion providing the music and the two Victory girls - Valerie & Vera. There were dances somewhere in Cambridge almost every night (except Christmas Day); with Percy Cowell & Reg Cottage's band at the Dorothy and Josephine with her Gypsy Orchestra at Guildhall

Church services were held as usual though even here the pressures of war were being aired. At the United Free Church service on Christmas morning the minister referred to a world of force and hatred, of feelings that the only hope of future peace is the extermination of every German man, woman & child. He went on to attributing the fall of France to the extensive drunkenness of the French army and complained that now our Government intended to introduce drink into the canteens of the ATS, WRNS & WAAF

By Christmas the Japanese had captured Singapore and hundreds of men of the Cambridgeshire Regiment had disappeared into captivity. But Montgomery's Eighth Army had beaten Rommel at the Battle of El Alamein, giving a much-needed success to celebrate/

This fourth wartime Christmas resembled an obstacle race with shops bare of delicacies. It would be a quiet Christmas - probably the quietest ever known. But by now we had got used to life short of saucepans & cups - the latter so rare that many railway refreshment rooms refused to serve those who did not bring their own. It was difficult getting clothes cleaned or getting anything repaired; utility furniture was all that was available, bedding so short that it only available to the bombed out and newly weds. Soap had gone on ration, petrol for cars and motorcycles cancelled, stocking were extremely scarce, shoes almost unobtainable; it became illegal to make bedspreads or tablecloths & ice cream manufacture was banned

There was controversy about whether Cambridge shops should close at 1pm on Christmas Eve - with most people working from 7.45am to 5pm and with only hour lunchtime there was difficulty enough getting to the shops anyway. Not surprisingly therefore there were few Christmas advertisements - except for useful gifts - overalls, pinnerettes, handkerchiefs (a good idea - four presents for one coupon) - or spend the money on war savings.

But the Government propaganda was upbeat: It will take more than Hitler to stop the British housewife from setting a festive table. There were no special foods but a few tricks would make all the difference: stuffed flanks of beef may take the place of turkey, a little cold tea may be used to darken the complexion of Christmas cake or pudding

St Neots institution had pork from its own pig on Christmas Day. Others too had festive fare - but roast beef, not turkeys. At the WVS club service visitors of both sexes literally lined up in a solid queue from door to canteen and during Christmas afternoon there was an invitation party for 150 troops followed in the evening by a professional cabaret show and a dance

Although it was an austerity Christmas people were in good heart, with the United Nations at last taking the offensive on several fronts. And there were new playmates. The Americans servicemen had arrived and in Christmas week received a present of a bit of America in England when they accepted the keys of the American Red Cross club at the Priory, Huntingdon. It would provide them with a place where they could create an atmosphere as nearly like that of home as possible.

But in many houses there was sad news. Corporal Woodhouse was now known to have been killed in fighting on western front in 1940; two years of waiting and hoping had come to nothing. Then news came through that Captain Lord De Ramsey was a PoW in Japanese hands; he had been with an artillery brigade, which had arrived at Singapore just before the capitulation and had not been heard of since. What had happened to the others?

The tide of war seemed to be beginning to change. The Russians had repulsed the Germans on the Eastern Front. North Africa had been cleared and the Allied armies were pushing into Italy. The bouncing bomb had destroyed German dams and on Christmas Eve came news that General Dwight D. Eisenhower had been appointed Supreme Commander of Allied Forces with General Bernard Montgomery as his Field Commander.

This Christmas topped all others in the difficulties which had to be surmounted to make it 'merry'. The search for the Christmas dinner in the first place had been like the pursuit of a will-o-the-wisp, for never had the turkey - or even the humble goose, duck or chicken - been such a rare bird. Many householders sat down to an ordinary joint of beef or mutton, or possibly even a tin of Spam. Meanwhile nuts, crystallised fruits, tangerines, dates, figs and all the other tempting etceteras must remain merely a tender memory.

Another whole chapter could be written on the great Christmas drought, 1943. The landlord who can fill the flowing bowl this year was likely to be trampled to death in the rush of thirsty citizens

Shopping this Christmas has been little short of a nightmare, what with the acute shortages of supplies, depleted staffs (still further attenuated by the ravages of flu) and the problems of smuggling presents home when no wrapping paper is allowed. It has indeed been a case of 'he who hesitates is lost' for unless one gabbed a likely gift at first sight it was ten to one it would have vanished a second or so later!

Whilst every effort was made to provide a Christmas for those in institutions it was most difficult - even paper decorations were in very short supply. But at Addenbrookes two Christmas Day babies received a set of clothes from Dr Wolf & every baby in the ward got present due to generosity of other patients

There was however a new source of Christmas cheer - the Americans. They gave three parties in the Huntingdon area, two on Christmas eve, one on the Day itself. The men had been saving their sweet rations for several months to give to the children, whilst, it was rumoured, there would be Father Christmas and even Ice Cream

An Anglo-American services party was broadcast to America from Cambridge. There were 150 US servicemen & similar number of British women's services. Music was provided by the Thunderbolts Band on a stage alongside which was a Christmas tree with lights, flags of Allied nations and bunches of mistletoe. These were a trap for the unwary, but not - so far as we could see - used! (or so they reported to the folks back home). After a message from the Mayor there was a programme of music with singers from America & the Cambridge Amateur Operatic Society choir followed by impromptu messages from floor

For some other folk the best Christmas cheer came when letters arrived from Japanese PoW camps - from men who at the time they wrote them were still alive. Lance Corporal James Frist was in no 2 PoW camp, Thailand as was Corporal Pitsch & Corporal Feavour. Private Hewerdine was amongst 20,000 prisoners in camp near Moulmein and from Cambridge came news of the Turkentine brothers, Private Cullum of Darwin Drive and Sapper Howard of Gwydir Street. He had last been heard of in February 1942 following fall of Singapore. There were hopes and belief than 1943 would see the last wartime Christmas and that 1944 was going to be an unhappy year for their Japanese captors

The year had seen the start of the fightback with troops landed in France on D-Day pushing their way across Europe. But it was by no means over yet.

Christmas bells are ringing again over a blood-stained, war-weary world - last years high hopes of victory have not been fulfilled; we need renewed courage and determination. For whilst victories were more frequent than defeats and blackouts was half-lighting, hardships continued and the winter was bitter.

In spite of thick fog and unpleasant weather on Christmas Eve at Sawston the tradition of singing carols at the Village College proved as popular as ever while at Ickleton the Congregational & Methodist churches united for their carol service. Arrington held its

Christmas party for children with Americans in attendance, at Gamlingay there was the usual party with iced cakes – though the production of iced cakes was illegal and had been since early in the war - and Fulbourn Home Guard gave a supper for 350

Alice Reynolds & her Variety Highlights show entertained at the WVS services club on Christmas Day before moving on to an American camp. The dressing rooms caught fire but the show carried on regardless & a collection reimbursed the young lady whose clothes were burnt.

There were parties for evacuees, some music and dancing and hospitals, canteens & clubs made great effort to preserve the spirit of Yuletide. At Cambridge the YMCA gave a party for 200 service men & women, there was a Mayoral dinner at Falcon club with goose, roast potatoes & home-made punch and the Mayor ended up wearing paper hat.

There were true gingerbread men to fill children's stockings and Christmas cake would look twice as festive with a coating of icing. But it all seemed really very sad and depressing with reminders everywhere of the empty places at family fireside. At Wisbech the Mayor summarised the thoughts of thousands when he said that peace and the return of the boys and girls of Wisbech is the predominant desire in the hearts of us all

By Christmas it was all over; Germany had capitulated, the Atom bombs dropped on Japan. The first peacetime Christmas was celebrated with perhaps a little more of the old pre-war spirit - but it was mainly celebrated privately. It was essentially a time of thankful reunion with sons, daughters and husbands returning from the services for their first Christmas after many years. Where there was no reunion this essentially family festival was still tinged with thankfulness and a general anticipation of future homecomings from near and far prevailed everywhere.

Customers at the shops were more considerate and patient but there was still no abundance of good things. Quality not quantity was predominant in poultry stocks but it was only available to registered customers and anybody ordering late was unfortunate. Wines and spirits were in short supply but owing to certain reserves being held over for the holiday perhaps more people were lucky - though demand still exceeded supply

There was an International Christmas party at Cambridge Technical College involving students from West Africa, China, Yugoslavia, Austria and England. Huntingdon YMCA closed over Christmas now that so many servicemen had left & a last Christmas party was given by Americans at Bull Hotel Cambridge for children with Punch & Judy, conjuring, chewing gum and candy.

Still came news of soldiers like Driver Stanley Cooper, Royal Engineers, from Leverington, now known to have died in a Japanese Prison Camp. Not all the returning servicemen were at home. At Mill Road hospital where ex Prisoners-of-War from the Cambridgeshire Regiment were undergoing treatment there was a Christmas Day breakfast of ham & omelettes. It was followed by a dinner of roast turkey & roast port plus trimmings with Xmas pudding, mince pies & beer, then by a tea of sandwiches, Christmas cake, jellies, oranges, pears - all far distant from their previous Christmas fare in their PoW camps.

As usual Kings College carol service was broadcast, with 2,000 people crowded into building leaving several hundreds more outside. The candlelight scarcely reached vaulted roof but provided most of the light because the windows of the chapel had not yet been replaced. Never had the Christmas message of 'Peace on Earth & Goodwill' been more applicable.

Photographs of a changing community – Melbourn, by Mike Petty

Cambridgeshire communities are continuing to change as more and more houses are built in land that was once fields. The new residents look forward to living a peaceful way of life in a traditional English village – without realising that it has been changed forever by the building of their new houses.

Yet villages have always changed. What are now prized as quaint thatched cottages were once old, cramped and inconvenient dwellings that many villagers considered should be razed to the ground to make way for brick-build houses with roofs that did not leak and the benefit of indoor lavatories.

Many places have established History or Preservation Groups anxious to capture some aspect of their community's past often drawing upon the expertise and interest of 'newcomers' to record the 'Good Old Days'. Often they produce booklets, sometimes of reminiscences, sometimes of photographs. Indeed it has almost become a cottage industry in itself.

But few have published as well-produced a volume as that now issued by the Melbourn Village History Group. It has some 240 pages of old snapshots, postcards and photographs dating from the 1860s arranged in a stroll through the village along High Street, diverting down lanes as one comes across them, until the northern end of the village is reached. Several of the pictures have been restored and improved using modern scanning techniques to remove blemishes and correct the exposures of the original photographer.

The pictures are captioned but one picture is worth a hundred words and however much detail is provided one cannot but wish for more. I thought it might be interesting to delve back to some of the stories that have been carried in the back issues of the Cambridge Daily News over the last century and seen whether any of them can be matched up with the photographs in the book.

The cover shows a group of youngsters having fun on a bridge and captures the carefree days of childhood. But who were they? They may not have been locals for in 1897 Melbourn was welcoming children from London as the Cambridge Daily News for August that year reported:

At a meeting of the Royston Board of Guardians the question of London children coming into the country for a holiday and bringing infectious diseases with them was brought under consideration, cases of the kind having occurred in the locality. One case of scarlet fever had broken out at a house on the Moor, Melbourn to which three children had been sent by a holiday fund from Stoke Newington. Another was a case of diphtheria which had occurred at Meldreth at a house where 12 children from Stoke Newington were staying.

Nor were all children angels in those days, as the News reported in June 1899:

At Melbourn three schoolboys were summoned for breaking three panes of glass in the church window. Quite recently no less than 14 panes had been broken. An 11-year old stated he saw the lads shoot at the church window with a catapult. Witness was asked: 'Did you have a shot'. 'Yes, sir'. 'And you missed?' 'No, sir. I broke one'.

The church windows are clearly shown in one of the oldest pictures in the book, taken about 1865 [SCAN CHURCH]

It was not only children who were misbehaving, as this story from October 1899 shows:

Three London musicians and a comedian were charged with stealing a bag of potatoes, value four shillings, from a field in Melbourn. John King, roadman, said he saw one of them jump over a hedge, get the bag and place it on a trolley. PC Knight said he saw the prisoners with a piano organ on a trolley and found the potatoes lying on the seat, covered with a rug. He detained two and took them to Royston police station. Afterwards found the others had decamped with the pony in the direction of Baldock but being a cyclist he followed them. When the constable questioned them they claimed they had bought the potatoes from a man in a public house at Long Melford for 1s.6d.

Two of the village's policemen, Sergeant Barrett and Constable Conell are featured on the cover of the book

In earlier years punishment had been more severe. The Melbourn picture book features a wonderful picture of a group of men outside the Carrier's Arms public house in Dolphin Lane; the compilers believe it shows a farewell celebration for a group who were emigrating c1900, seeking a new life in a New World. But the Cambridge Independent press of October 1936 reported another connection between Melbourn and Australia

One of the last men to be sent to Botany Bay lived in an old cottage at Dolphin Lane, Melbourn, now due for demolition. In the Botany Bay days (1787-1868), a wagonload of convicts, manacled and in chains, passed through Melbourn on their way from an East

Anglian prison to the London docks. One of the prisoners was a Melbourn man. The driver managed to take his wagon and charges past his former home and on hearing some shouting the old couple came to the door and were able to bid their son a tearful and last goodbye

By August 1901 the village was having a problem: its graveyard and cemeteries were too full:

The Local Government Board told Melbourn Rural District Council that the opening of any new burial ground in the parish of Melbourn should be prohibited and burials discontinued forthwith and entirely in the parish churchyard of All Saints' Melbourn, for the protection of the public health. It rested with the Parish Council to take the necessary steps..

The problem was obviously overcome for a picture shows Milly Catley's funeral procession about 1932, with the coffin borne on a flower-bedecked bier [SCAN FUNERAL]

It was not only the graveyard that was causing problems in April 1904:

An inquiry was held into the promotion of the Meldreth and Melbourn District Gas and Water Company Bill; it aroused a deal of opposition and at times the exchanges were of a very lively character. The present Gasworks at Melbourn were not up-to-date and with growing demand a new company had been formed who would erect new gasworks in Meldreth; there had been no objection from residents. Water supplies were obtained from the river and wells and a good supply would enhance the value of property. There would be a pumping station near Melbourn Heath Farm and a 200,000-gallon reservoir. The County Council supported the scheme but the Parish and District Councils objected

In the early 1900s Nonconformists throughout the country protested against changes in the way religion was to be taught in village schools. Many refused to pay their education rates so the judicial process was put in place and eventually bailiffs seized goods to be auctioned off to meet the money due. Often these sales were disrupted, as the News reported in September 1903

The first sale of goods seized from the passive resisters of St Ives was held near the police station. None of the local auctioneers would accept the office so a Peterborough firm was imported to carry out the sale. The appearance of the auctioneer was the sequel for an uproar of groans, hooting and hissing. The first lot was a Brussels carpet and teapot, then came a sewing machine taken from Mr Money, tailor, to pay his arrears of 9d; this was run up to 30s. at which price it was knocked down to his employer. The sale closed amidst general uproar and the crowd made for the Cromwell Statue for a great demonstration.

Photographs of such sales are rare but the Melbourn book includes two of a sale there in 1905

The book includes a marvellous picture of Abrey's shop in Drury Lane, with Maggie Stanford and her son Edwin and Daisy Abrey. One couple who knew the area well were John Preston Hall and his wife who made the news back in November 1925

There are at least two very happy married couples in Cambridgeshire today. In Melbourn there dwell Mr & Mrs John Preston Hall, who were married 68 years ago. They have lived in the same old-world thatched cottage in Drury Lane for 65 years. He is a working carpenter and at one time there were seven of his people all over 70. In Horningsea are another married couple whose name, curiously enough, is Melbourn, who celebrate their diamond wedding. Mr Melbourn worked on one farm from early boyhood until a few years ago. Hearty congratulations to both couples on their wonderful record

But in those days there was little money to maintain old cottages. During heavy snow in December 1927 the paper reported: A thatched cottage at Melbourn collapsed about seven o'clock in Sunday evening. The bedroom end of the house fell out, but, happily, Mrs Greig was in the bottom room and escaped injury. She would not move however until the policeman came on Monday morning. She is now living in a cottage just opposite.

Members of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society were concerned about the loss of such ancient cottages and in 1904 started a photographic survey of Cambridgeshire. One of their contributors was Percy Salmon, a professional photographer who retired to live in Melbourn in the 1920s. His photograph of a disappearing landmark was published in the Cambridge Independent press of 23rd July 1927.

In a few days time the old seventh-century Red Lion inn on the Cambridge-Royston road is to be demolished, standing as it does it forms a sort of bottle-neck entrance to the village, which today is said to be very dangerous. The old house dates from the year 1659 and until 1923 was a fully-licensed house, serving as a coaching inn with yards and stables complete. The going of the inn has led some old inhabitants to recall many other one-time taverns which are now private houses. These include the Old Elm Tree, the Tailor's Arms, the Locomotive, Royal Oak – now Howard's bakery, Hoops, Spotted Dog – now Mrs E. Thompson's garage, White Horse & Oak

But the Antiquarians were not the only people concerned about the loss of our heritage; a regional planning report of 1934 stressed the importance of preserving old cottages and four years later Cambridge Preservation Society started work on cottages at Melbourn; their report for 1939 records what happened:

The cottages were fully reconditioned and brought up to a reasonable standard of comfort and convenience. Each has been supplied with a ventilated foodstore and new cooking range where necessary. The interiors were put in first class order and redecorated throughout; several staircases were replaced. The wash-houses have been rebuilt where necessary, and the coppers put into working order. The whole row was thatched. The centre section which appears to have been an old farmhouse of perhaps the sixteenth century, built round a great central chimney, was for many years divided into two cottages, but has now been restored as one dwelling. It is probable that the rest of the cottages were originally constructed out of the old barns and out-buildings. There can be no doubt that such schemes of reconditioning are a great help towards the solution of the housing problems in villages. With the sympathetic aid of the Rural District Council cottages can be reconditioned and let at rents within the means not only of the agricultural labourer in work, but of widows & old-age pensioners.

The cottages were restored again in 2004, ensuring this part of the village remains outwardly unchanged though providing the modern facilities now considered essential.

One of the low-points to village pride came in 1974 when the judges in the Best Kept Village competition relegated them to the bottom spot. But residents hit back:

Melbourn, South Cambridgeshire's worst kept village, is determined to remove that insulting title from its records. But residents have a tough job on their hands because they claim the biggest rubbish culprits are people driving through the village.. The parish council feel the solution to their litter problem will only come when the proposed by-pass is built in a few years time. "When we get the by-pass we shall be a village again", said Mr Aldridge. One of the worst spots is the village green near the traffic lights. Nearly every evening it was crowded with young people who tended to throw Coca-Cola tins and other litter on the green.

The by-pass has now been opened and although traffic levels have not quite returned to those captured by some of the photographs, things are much less congested than previously

Open countryside is nearby for those who enjoy walks in the open air; the book features a view of strollers along Ashwell Street back in 1939. But it was not always a pleasant stroll, as David Waterson reported in June 1977

Ashwell Street is no walk for the timorous. It needs nerves of steel to pass dogs barking and straining at the leash as the lane wends its seven miles between Ashwell and Melbourn. It is always hitting the headlines with stories of its squatters' rights problems, damage to neighbouring property at Litlington and litter, particularly at the Ashwell End. It is easy to understand why this is one of the more "unknown" green lane rambles. Maybe its not risking life and limb, but it comes darned close to it – David Waterson

But all in all Melbourn is a most pleasant village which has preserved not only many of its ancient properties, but the facilities that attract both locals and outsiders. However country life is not just town life without the traffic fumes, as the News commented in March 1978

House-hunters looking to live in the country should be prepared to put up with country life – like flies and farmyard smells, said Coun Ken Turner of Hardwick. "Some people come into villages – they might be called the bed-and-breakfast residents – and the first thing they want to do is do away with the country way of life". Coun John Impey from Melbourn said a chicken farmer had been threatened with enforcement action by the environment department after a complaint about flies. The flies were not from his farm and it seemed unfair that pressure could be put on a long-established business because someone had decided to build homes nearby

Whether you are a newcomer, a former villager who has moved away to pastures new, or just somebody interested in the past then “Pictorial Melbourn” makes an ideal addition to your bookshelf. It costs £15 for the first copy and £10 for each subsequent one. If you can get hold of them. For Colin Limming, chairman of Melbourn History Society tells me that when it was launched: “The good burghers of Melbourn were queuing up before we were opened and we had a steady queue almost all of the two days”.

But no collection of photographs can ever be complete, nor can anybody know the full story behind each picture. If you can help make Melbourn’s magnificent record even better then contact Colin Limming on 01763 260072 or e-mail colin.limming@ukonline.co.uk

Then early in 2005 all village households will also receive another book on the History of Melbourn; it will be distributed free of charge thanks to a grant from The Countryside Agency with additional copies on sale for £7.

Two visits by the Dukes of Gloucester by Mike Petty, February 2005

Though nobody knows for sure I suspect that Cambridge’s Gloucester Street may have been named after William Frederick, Duke of Gloucester. He was a nephew of King George III and the first member of the of the Royal Family ever to attend an English university, as Fellow Commoner of Trinity College.

But there was something else for in 1811 the Duke was elected to the University’s highest position, that of Chancellor – the post now filled by the Duke of Edinburgh.

The installation ceremony was a grand affair, but the weather didn’t play its part. There was a thunderstorm on Friday 28th June 1811 when the Duke arrived in a coach to take lodgings in his old college and prepare for the excitement to come. It did not however prevent crowds turning out to cheer and stare. It was something they were to do several times that weekend.

Next day was the great day. Senior members of the University, distinguished guests and splendidly-dressed ladies arrived in their carriages at the Senate House. Then the official entourage of academics escorted the Duke to his installation through crowded streets of cheering onlookers. An eyewitness recalled: “the crowd huzzared as the Duke walked along, the ladies waving their handkerchiefs from the windows and his Highness replirted to their congratulations by gracious bows and smiles”.

At the steps of the University’s Senate House the Duke was met by Vice-chancellor, who led him inside as a band of music in the gallery struck up the coronation anthem. Then the Vice Chancellor made a speech in English and presented his Highness with the book of University Statutes. Newspaper correspondents recorded: “After this the Vice-Chancellor taking His Highness’s right hand in his own, the Senior Proctor administered the oath; His Highness then was seated in the chair of state and thereby installed”. It was formal but everybody could understand what was being said.

Then the Public Orator delivered another eulogy, but this one in Latin. The Duke's reply was however spoken in his native tongue before it was time for a specially-composed installation ode performed by the band. The ceremonial concluded a grand procession of Yeomen Bedells, Bachelors of Physic, Law and Divinity, Taxors, Proctors, Professors and bishops and who-knows-what marched to Trinity College for a feast back at Trinity College.

By evening the scene had been transformed with an illuminated pavilion in the centre of the grass from which the Duke's band played whilst fireworks fizzled somewhat disappointingly in a drizzling rain. There was more to witness next morning as the Duke attended service at Great St Mary's Church where a large band of musicians played an oratorio by Handel. This was the highlight of the service for the sermon was an attack on Methodists, it was followed by a recitation of a long list of names of those who had been benefactors to the University and an overlong anthem composed by an undergraduate for his degree.

But the University had not finished yet; their new Chancellor had to turn out next morning to confer degrees on various eminent Marquises, Dukes, Bishops and Knights. in the Senate House. Once more the finery was in evidence, once more the streets packed with onlookers but the ceremony was somewhat spoiled when it was realised that some of the wording on the honorary degrees was wrong. It took a considerable amount of whispered debate amongst dons before it could be sorted out to everybody's satisfaction. There was another embarrassing moment when Lord Erksine walked off before the Orator had finished singing his Latin praises.

But if the Duke thought that by the end of the day he had done he was mistaken; he was back again on the Tuesday, dishing out more degrees. Though by now some of the onlookers had started to smirk at some of the ceremonies, like putting a matrimonial ring on the recipient's finger and kissing his cheeks – even the Chancellor could be seen to smile occasionally. Then there were recitations of prize-winning poetry in Greek and Latin.

For some the highlight of the whole event was a balloon ascent by Mr Sadler from Trinity Great Court. Crowds arrived early to be sure of a good view and stood shivering in the drizzling rain – it was July after all – for some time. Once the proceedings started the balloon was up and out of sight within three minutes, lost in the low cloud. Fortunately the weather cleared in time for a grand public breakfast back in Neville's Court, Trinity. There were meats, ices and tastefully arranged fruit, followed by yet more music. This time it was a dance, ladies and their beaux weaving in and out of the avenue of trees along the Backs. Here again things did not quite go as well as the organisers hoped. True the band played well and their lively jigs were just what was required. But the Duke was wandering around and whenever he approached the band they left off their tune mid-beat and struck up with God Save the King, exasperating the dancers and causing many to hiss rather than cheer his Highness.

The Duke knew better than to outstay his already somewhat extended visit; he took to his carriage and departed. Two hours later came another burst of applause leaving some to wonder if he'd changed his mind and come back. But no – the cheering welcomed a true hero, the balloonist himself who had ended his aerial excursion in a field near Stansted and been rushed back to receive the adulation that was truly his.

One way and another Cambridge folk could hardly have been unaware of the visit of the Duke of Gloucester and perhaps they chose to commemorate the occasion by naming one of their meaner streets after him!

By contrast a later visit by another Duke of Gloucester was a much tamer affair – though it nearly cost him his life!

This was not a glamorous assignment: there had been a major flood, scores of people were homeless, hundreds of miles of land submerged. Tanks had been in action, there had been acts of heroism to acknowledge; there were hands to be shaken, encouragement to be given. Somebody had to do it and it was the Duke and Duchess of Gloucester who were selected.

It wouldn't be so bad if the location had been a tropical island or a quaint Cornish village – but this was just a lot of muddy fields in the fens at the end of March 1947.

The Duke and Duchess started their tour by a visit to the site of the tank engagement. They took their car to Bluntisham station where they were greeted by the military as they walked across a muddy yard to the waiting train. It was not even a first-class carriage, just third-class tourist. Fortunately the journey was a short one, just half-mile down the track, across a railway bridge over a swollen river and they could disembark. They then transferred to an even more basic mode of transport, a contractor's open trolley running along a light railway. The press pack snapped away but one picture shows W.E. Doran, the River Board Engineer, with his hands together as if in prayer. When asked why he replied that he had the Duke and Duchess on a line of trolleys held together with string and he was praying that the string did not break.

The string held and the Royal party could see for themselves how a line of Buffalo amphibious tanks had been manoeuvred into place to form a box around a 90-foot gap in the bank of the Great Ouse river. Although not watertight it had provided enough of a seal to allow an army of soldiers, German prisoners and fenmen to rebuild the earthen wall and stop yet more water flooding across the low-lying fenland alongside. After a few minutes of inspecting and encouraging it was back on the trolley to the carriage, back to the station and the limousine that the Duke himself drove off to their next inspection point.

Their route took them through Ely to Littleport and then on to the hamlet of Ten Mile Bank. Few folk there could ever have thought that they would ever be visited by a real Royal, even if it was the Duke of Gloucester. Some found him not the most approachable of dignitaries, though it would not be appropriate to say so. Instead they commented on how nice the Duchess was!

Here it was time for another mode of transport, this time one of the amphibious army DUKWs that would take them for a cruise along the River Wissey so they could thank the army of men shovelling mud on the banks. Once more it was a mixture of military and civilians, though the fenmen had little doubt who was doing the most work. For the soldiers had not apparently appreciated just how hard shovelling mud was, nor how they could not shovel mud if they did not have a shovel! The first tool to drop from frozen fingers could well have been an accident but others quickly followed and some do say that the bank was made up more of discarded spades than earth!

As the DUKW approached the breach in the bank that had allowed water to surge across towards Southery, smashing through a road and sweeping away a house, disaster struck. For some reason – some say mechanical failure, others blame the driver – the engine of the craft cut out. Without power the royal party were being sucked towards the gap in the bank through which water was still rushing powerfully. Once more it was time for prayer as two of the aristocracy were swept towards the breach and death by drowning in the muddy water. Photographs show the look of concern as their fate seemed sealed. But soldiers plunged into the river to take a rope out to the stricken craft and man-power succeeded where motor-power could not; the craft was towed to the bank.

It was something that would have dominated the headlines, but it was hushed up. A photographer who captured the dramatic scenes was ordered to destroy his negatives, but one creased snap survived as proof. The visit concluded, the Duke and Duchess headed off back to civilisation, away from the muck of the flooded fen.

So what had caused the floods that devastated large areas of fenland in this surely unparalleled disaster? For that you will need to wait for the next issue of 'Our Time'!

Our Time February 2005

Gloucester Street by Mike Petty,.

Gloucester Street has disappeared from the map of Cambridge almost unnoticed. It was a nondescript little lane opening off Castle Street, about where the entrance road to the commercial units behind Shire Hall now runs.

When the Cambridge News sent its reported Erica Dimock to survey it for her 'Down Your Street' series in March 1964 she found that even then it had changed out of all recognition from what it had been only 40 years earlier. And, she speculated, it would shortly change once more. It has, but not in the way she thought. For then there were plans for the erection of new Shire Hall courts and the creation of a new major spine relief road that would cut through the site. Neither of them was to materialise.

Erica found a miscellany of small cottages, factories and wasteland situated in the oldest part of Cambridge. It had become a built-up residential street around 1800 and street directories dating back to the 1840s indicate that it was already a very closely populated area with several terraces of cottages leading off, earning it the nickname of "the warren."

She recorded various stories which had been passed down about the 'goings on' in Gloucester Street in years gone by when its notoriety was common talk throughout the town. One concerned a laundress who had certain clairvoyant powers which were so remarkable that local inhabitants were convinced she was a witch. One day - so the story goes - two men were on their way to consult her when one remarked to the other, 'I wonder what the old . . . will tell us'. On their arrival the old lady greeted them with the words 'You've been wondering what the old... will tell you,' whereupon the two men were so disconcerted that they immediately took their leave.

There certainly was a laundress in Gloucester Street in 1897 for she was charged with keeping a woman at work for more than 14 hours. Annie Sindell told the Court that she had started work at 9.30 am Friday and not finished until ten past six the next morning. She never agreed to work all night but the laundress would have the work done. She had been allowed a break of an hour and a quarter for meals. Her day was supposed to be of 12 hours, less meal times, and for that she got 1s.3d. and the overtime pay was a penny an hour. The laundress was fined 7s.6d. and costs.

Spalding's Cambridge Street Directory for 1898 lists Mrs Martha Nichols as a laundress in Bell and Son's builders' Yard on the north side of Gloucester Street. Her neighbours included Arthur Stonebridge a bricklayer, Frederick Bell a painter and Samuel Mortlock a bricklayer. There is no knowing if they were concerned with the street brawls and screams and shouts which lasted night and day which were very frequent in an area in which the closeness of the houses, and the density of the population were so conducive.

But it was also an area of compassion for in May 1926 the Gloucester Street workshop for disabled soldiers in Cambridge was opened by Princess Mary. By 1927 there were eight men working there, each suffering from the loss of arms or legs or the effects of gas. They made baskets and re-upholstered chairs, or knitted silk stockings, jumpers and ties. The workshop could never be a paying concern but did good work in enabling the men to earn sufficient money to keep them off the dole. Two of the old soldiers, Mr H.A. Hagger and Mr F.C. Fuller met the Queen and Duchess of York when they attended an exhibition and sale of their goods in London. The Queen bought a pair of heather-mixture socks and a waste paper basket, the Duchess a fancy rush stool remarking "It will do for Princess Elizabeth for the nursery". Their stock was quickly sold and by the time the Prince of Wales visited they had nothing left to sell him.

By 1964 the workshops were long forgotten but there were other commercial establishments in Gloucester Street. Three were individual but closely associated companies, the Tansley Typewriter Company, the British Rebuilt Typewriter Company and the Brittan Manufacturing Company. Tansley had been started in 1923 and had made several moves on around Cambridge before settling in Gloucester Street in 1934. It supplied and serviced all kinds of typewriters. One employee was Mrs Sylvia Howell (nee Bavester) of Landbeach who worked there during the war doing a lot of different jobs on the floor. In her time there were only about six girls, the rest of them boys and men. John Simmons was one of them; he'd started working there as a lad in the 1930s helping to rebuild typewriters. This involved dismantling then re-enameilling the bodies, replating the shiny bits, regrinding the platens (rubber rollers) and replacing worn letters or springs. He recalled that the company also went round the area servicing typewriters and adding machines.

The second company - British Rebuilt Typewriters - were concerned with rebuilding the machines for sale throughout the world. While the Brittan Manufacturing Company made repetition lathes. Many of the employees had remained there since arriving as apprentices straight from school and the firm offered good opportunities for boys interested in precision engineering.

Just opposite was a path leading to the printing works of R. I. Severs Ltd. It had been started by Mr Severs early in the century and was based in Hobson Street before moving to Gloucester Street in 1928. But another move was on the horizon with plans to transfer the printing works to a new factory in King Hedges Road. They were general jobbing printers who undertake almost anything from wedding stationery and theatre programmes to magazines, books of a specialised nature and a wide variety of orders from local firms and colleges.

One very large area at the end of Gloucester Street was then occupied by M. Dickerson (Contractors) Ltd. The firm who had two associated companies, Teversham Corner Garage and the Land beach Sand and Gravel Company, had been founded by Mr. Dickerson of Manygates, Hills Road 33 years before and had grown considerably since then.

Another company based in the Street were Radio and Television Services the service organisation of the Pye-Ekco Group who were concerned with repairs to radio, television and record-playing equipment. They kept 32,000 different spare parts on the premises and something like 2,000 parcels containing spare parts were sent to retail shops throughout the country each day. They also had a team of 17 salesmen were also out selling parts. This company was also looking to move out shortly.

There had already been a considerable change as Sindalls, the building firm had moved their administrative premises to Cherry Hinton Road. Their old offices now housed the County Council's Welfare and Weights and Measures Departments together with the offices of the County Library.

In those days both County and City had their own library services with the County's main lending library in a prefabricated building alongside the castle mound. Here too change was in the air for the Cambridgeshire County Library service which had started in the 1920s was about to be amalgamated with that of the Isle of Ely as part of the Local Government Reorganisation that was to be implemented the following month. In addition to a range of branch libraries they were planning introduce a completely new mobile library which would tour 90 of those villages which were then without book lending facilities. It would call at regular fortnightly intervals, carrying a stock of 3,000 books on a wide range of interests from gardening and crafts to history, travel and biography as well as novels. These would be issued free of charge on a family membership ticket allowing one member of the family to borrow or the rest of the family as well as themselves.

Erica explored the intricacies of weights and measures department and the way they ensured their own weights were accurate. Nearby the Welfare Department did all they could to help the aged to remain in their own homes for as long as possible but also had a duty to provide temporary accommodation for the homeless.

This was an issue that was to affect many of the private residents in the Gloucester Street area as more and more of the cottages were demolished as part of a slum clearance scheme.

Among those who had lived in Gloucester Street for more than 30 years were Mr. and Mrs. Newman at No. 11 and Mrs. Gedge at No.2. She found finds the street very convenient for the town and the shops round the corner on Histon Road and in Castle Street. Nearby were Mr. and Mrs. Barry Smith. They lived in a house owned by the Cambridge City Football Club that was previously occupied by former City manager, Mr. Oscar Hold. He had built up a very fine City team, which, with four replacements, went on to take the Southern League championship under his successor, player-manager Frank Cruickshank.

Another resident was Vic Newman, who, with his wife, Rose, had acted as an air raid warden during the war. He remembered what it had been in the 1930s with a building firm called Bell, an orchard and a Mission Hall the outstanding features among the rows of terraced cottages. Vic had recently retired after 36 years as a college 'gyp' at Clare and was planning to move. Although he would be sorry to leave Gloucester Street it was not quite as good as it used to be when he had more neighbours.

Soon all the houses would be gone and the names of those who had once lived in this area forgotten. But something more important that has dropped out of the history books is why it was called 'Gloucester Street' in the first place?

: Arthur Nicholls and the one-legged woman, by Mike Petty

Some of the oldest photographs ever taken of Cambridge are now on display in the Lending department of the Central Library in Lion Yard.

They were probably created by a photographer named Arthur Nicholls [SUBS ARTHUR IS NICHOLLS WITH TWO LS] who set up his studio in All Saints Passage just off Trinity Street in about 1864.

Cambridge was an then undergoing radical change with three major building projects under way outside his studio door. Within a short space of time the old All Saints' Church was demolished, Trinity College built Whewell's court and across the road St John's College pulled down and replaced its Chapel.

Arthur Nicholls took his bulky glass-plate camera out into the street to record 'before and after' views of these changes. It may have been this building and the resultant noise and dust which caused him to move to a new studio in Post Office Terrace off St Andrew's Street. From here he continued to photograph Cambridge people and places until he left for the Isle of Wight in 1879 leaving his negatives behind.

Other photographers followed him into the Post Office Terrace studios, names like Valentine Blanchard, Colin Lunn, J. Palmer Clarke and Ramsey and Muspratt, two lady photographers who defied sceptics and succeeded in enhancing the reputation of their predecessors. Each inherited the photographic negatives of those who had gone before and each reproduced some of Arthur's Cambridge streetscapes.

The final custodian of the archive was Peter Lofts who completed the transfer of thousands of old negatives to the Cambridgeshire Collection in Cambridge's Lion Yard Library. Now Peter has employed the latest digital photographic techniques to offer framed and mounted views of many of what have become classic scenes of old Cambridge.

St Andrews Street looking south

One of the earliest views captures the scene in St Andrew's Street looking south from what is now the entrance to Bradwell's Court. The buildings on the left were swept away 50 years ago for new shops and offices. Now those on the right are due for demolition for another development, the Grand Arcade. The entrance to the studios in Post Office Terrace was under the archway on the right. [SCAN 102.73 TAKE MODERN VIEW FROM JUST BEYOND THE HOARDINGS ROUND BRADWELL'S COURT]

Trumpington Street looking south

Nicholls took two views from the same spot in Trumpington Street. In one he turned his camera south towards the Fitzwilliam Museum with the entrance to Pembroke Street on the left. The transformation in the street has been caused by the erection of Emmanuel Congregational Church designed by James Cubitt which opened in May 1874 at a cost of £13,000 [SCAN 102.74 TAKE MODERN VIEW – See PHOTOCOPY]

Trumpington Street looking north

He then turned to the north, looking down past the junction of Silver Street towards King's College chapel

Sidney Street. The principal differences are in the buildings on the left near King's College chapel where Nicholl's photograph shows a group of buildings which King's College wanted to pull down in the 1830s so that they could complete their new screen. But the owner held out for what the college considered an exorbitant price so it was not until 1871 that it was demolished, transforming this section of King's Parade [SCAN 102.75 TAKE MODERN VIEW – SEE PHOTOCOPY]

Sidney Street looking north

Sidney Street has at first glance changed little over the last century-and-a-half; the projecting clock that marked the premises of Wehrle's watchmakers and jewellers has gone and the rough cobbles have given way to a more modern version. The picture also highlights some of the technical difficulties of photography in the 1860s. In those days shutter speeds were slow and people needed to stand still to ensure a sharp image. The gentlemen standing by the cart are carefully watching the photographer in action but the ladies are far too busy to stop and stare. As a result Nicholls has had to spend time in his darkroom carefully touching up the prints to disguise their moving skirts [SCAN 102.45 TAKE MODERN VIEW – SEE PHOTOCOPY]

Magdalene Street looking north

At first glance Magdalene Street seems to have changed little; the old shops and pubs on the left had side have survived in spite of plans to demolish them for road widening in the 1920s and again in the 1950s. But the change has come on the right hand side where the buildings in the foreground have been demolished to give access to the riverside area of Magdalene College and the tall chimneys that were such a dominant part of the skyline have been demolished, leaving one solitary reminder. Beyond the college old properties were demolished in about 1912 for new college buildings. [SCAN 102.76 TAKE MODERN VIEW – SEE PHOTOCOPY]

Petty Cury looking west

Petty Cury has changed almost out of all recognition. Nicholls set up his camera at the Sidney Street end and looked towards the market, the large building at the end being part of the old Cambridge Guildhall. Most of the shops on the right-hand side were demolished during of the wholesale redevelopment of Cambridge in the 1930s, these being replaced by the Boots development. The buildings on the left include the gables of the Wrestlers Inn, Cambridge's best Jacobean building, its front covered by profuse carvings. It was demolished in 1885, about 25 years after this picture was taken. Further along one can see the shape of a Red Lion at the entrance of the Hotel that gave its name to the scheme which would raze the rest of the buildings for the redevelopment of the 1970s. [SCAN 102.77 TAKE MODERN VIEW LOOKING TO GUILDHALL]

Market Hill looking west from Petty Cury

But of all Nicholl's photographs it is this view of Market Hill that is best known. Great St Mary's church dominates the background above market stalls, gas lights and the bustle of everyday life. But while policeman and sergeant stand still for their picture others bustle through just leaving a fleeting impression.

Peter Lofts has chosen to reproduce the old pictures using the most modern of digital techniques but previous generations of photographers relied on their own skills in the darkroom. One of those was Mrs Pam Ford of Trumpington who writes:

"I am very familiar with the picture of the Market Square. In the 1960's I worked for Lettice Ramsey at the photographers Ramsey and Muspratt in Post Office Terrace. I was employed to make up clients' wedding day albums and to touch up defects in other photographs. The glass negatives were often printed for clients and were labelled 'Old Cambridge'. When the view of the Market Square was ordered I always had to paint a second foot under the long dress of the lady who is behind the policeman so that she wouldn't look one-legged!" [SCAN 102.42 TAKE MODERN VIEW]

Copies of the images can be viewed on Peter Loft's website: www.loftyimages.co.uk and ordered from him at 2 Lamport Close, Market Deeping, Peterborough, PE6 8BU. They cost £25 mounted, £45 framed. They are of course also available in the Cambridgeshire Collection together with hundreds of thousands of other views of the county. .

Our Time 2005 03

March floods, by Mike Petty

March is the month that fenmen probably dread more than any other; for time after time it has been March when the ingenuity and hard work of generations of drainers has been overcome by the force of nature.

The stories of the March of 1937 and 1947 are very similar

The high spring tides coincide with heavy rain. The great sluice at Denver cannot be opened to allow the rivers to empty into the sea and more and more water drains into the fenland river system.

The high river banks are full to the brim and are crumbling and dissolving in the water just as sugar dissolves in tea. Slips occur, the bank slides a bit, but as it threatens to break men rush to bolster it up with clay and sandbags. The banks themselves are already two feet higher because of these lines of sacks but still the water seeps through and strong winds blow sheets of water out from the river and down into the adjoining fen - fen that is itself a sea of mud comparable with the mud of Flanders. "The way feet sink in with a dull sucking noise reminds me of the time when we moved into Passchendale during the war" an old soldier recalls.

The sodden fen means that lorries cannot get near to bring bags - potato bags, sandbags - any sort of bag - and the sodden land itself is unsuitable for filling them. 10,000 bags have been laid in a day and the water is seeping through at the places they placed the bags yesterday afternoon

The men are willing but almost at the end of their tether. Most are now so tired that if some really terrible disaster came along they would hardly be any use at all. Throughout the fen, along the top of river and drain every available man - hundreds of men, wet and weary - watch the water in the river while even more rain penetrates their clothing and the incessant cold wind chills them even more.

There is talk of calling in the army and at Ely a bugler is standing by to sound a "fall in" for volunteers in the event of a major burst. The town criers at Haddenham and Swavesey are appealing for extra men to go to the aid of Willingham, just one of the danger points. The banks have breached at Barway and Lt Thetford and the main A10 is cut by flooding near Stretham - the car loads of undergraduates flocking to help must find another way on to the Isle of Ely.

The BBC broadcasts flood warnings urging people to alert their neighbours without wireless sets to listen for the church bells which will announce the time has come for evacuation.

For many families it is already too later. Their land is under water, their homes are flooded. "We fenland folk can stand a lot. The water has got to be coming over the doorstep before we begin to flit". A horseman tells me that the water has reached his front door... his wife is sweeping it away with a broom.

It is the worst flood for many years - worse than 1928, worse than last year. It is March 1937. "We've got out of scrapes before, and we'll get out of this one" says a fen farmer. He is right.

The floods of March 1937 are now largely forgotten. They were only a minor dampness compared to the devastation that was to follow ten years later.

The high spring tides coincide with a sudden thaw of the heavy snow. The great sluice at Denver cannot be opened to allow the rivers to empty into the sea and more and more water drains into the fenland river system.

The high river banks are full to the brim and are crumbling and dissolving in the water just as sugar dissolves in tea. Slips occur, the bank slides a bit, but as it threatens to break men rush to bolster it up with clay and sandbags ... its the same old story, March 1937 over again but this time worse.

On March 16th 1947 hurricane force winds swept sheets of water over the bank tops and sent the patrolling men scurrying for shelter. Roads were blocked by fallen trees, telephones lines blown down and 190 people evacuated from the Prickwillow area as flooding threatened.

But it was March 17th when the main breaches occurred. One was at Lt Thetford which swamped the main railway line and spread south to close the Wicken road and threaten the main A10 at Stretham Ferry.

The other was out in the fen near Earith where a 50 yard gap had been torn in the river bank and properties at Over and Willingham were flooded. Once released the water flowed east until it was checked by the main Old West river bank alongside which runs the Earith to Willingham road

For a while this held back the flood but as the water level increased so the very bank itself was overtopped and water began to trickle into Hilrow fen.

A wholesale evacuation started, first the tools of their trade farm implements and livestock, then furniture and effects. Behind them came a steady stream of water driving rabbits and rats ahead of it. By nightfall on the 18th much of what in the morning had been fertile fen was a mass of grey water. Houses, farm buildings and stacks stood deserted and marooned whilst families found shelter where they could. Elsewhere the battle continued.

Along the A10 between Littleport and Southery soldiers constructed a sandbag wall using the road as a foundation. They hoped to hold back the water that was roaring through the broken bank of the River Wissey between Hilgay and Denver Sluice. If they could keep it penned to the west of the A10 then the farms and fertile land to the east would be safe. It was a frantic fight against the rising floodwater but by hard work the dam rose high enough to withstand the waves. But nature was not to be beaten. The pent-up water found a weak spot in a culvert underneath the road, as it forced its way through the pressure built up until it blew the road apart as if it had been hit by a bomb. Now released the flood surged through the gap and as it did so it undermined the foundations of a substantial brick-built house that had always been on the wrong side of the road. The owners had put their furniture upstairs but it was no avail as the whole house was washed away.

Back at Earith the water poured unchecked through the broken bank for five days and rose higher and higher, brick by brick, up the flooded houses. Then on the 24th "Operation Neptune" finally sealed the breach by constructing a steel wall of amphibious vehicles around it and allowing more orthodox repair work to start. This was what the Duke of Gloucester was shown on his visit.

Hundreds of pumps were brought in to suck the water off the land and throw it back into the rivers.

As the floods went down and families returned to their shattered homes they were horrified by the sights that confronted them. Ruined shells of houses, stinking mud impregnated walls, scratches on the windowsills were rats had scabbled to keep above the water. Undeterred they replanted their fields, rebuilt their houses and eventually when the walls had finally dried out made them homes again.

Since then new rivers have been cut, the banks have been strengthened but should nature once more combine wind, waves and water then danger will once more threaten. The fenman can never be complacent, the threat is never ending.

One man, Walter Martin Lane produced a magnificent photograph record of the 1947 floods in the Haddenham and Southery areas; his pictures were shown on cinema screens and published in the Lord Mayor of London's official appeal brochure for victims of the disaster. Later he donated them to the Cambridgeshire Collection in Cambridge's Lion Yard Library where they can be seen. Some have also been used in a two-hour video of the floods compiled by Littleport man, Tony Buckingham, together with moving pictures taken by newsreel cameramen and moving stories of the people involved. The Video entitled 'The winter of '47: a countdown to disaster' costs £20 from local shops and libraries or direct from Tony at www.luckybuckproductions.com. Cambridgeshire Libraries have also reprinted 'The Battle of the Banks', an account of the floods first issued by Ely Rotary Club in 1947.

Mike Petty will be lecturing on fenland flooding at Wilburton on 4th March, Deeping St James on 10th March, Peakirk on 14th & at Ely Library on the 11th & 18th of March, 10.15 to 12 noon. Phone 01353 648106 or e-mail mikepetty@fenhistory.fsnet.co.uk for details.

Cambridge Civic Restaurant – Mike Petty

In March 1972 Cambridge lost one of its best-loved restaurants.

It was no three-star Michelin establishment, in fact it was somewhat basic in its cuisine and the atmosphere lacked the discrete candle-lit charm of other more up-market eateries. But it offered good quality food at inexpensive prices to ordinary folk, and what it did it did well.

The Civic Restaurant could trace its roots back to one of the most prestigious dining places in Cambridge – the University Pitt Club in Jesus Lane, now a Pizza Parlour. It occupied one of the most distinctive buildings in the city: the former Roman Baths.

Unlike those at Bath these had no great antiquity. They were built in 1862 to be a superior variety of Turkish Bath where having passed through the steamy stages people would cool off by a plunge into cold water. The enterprise attracted sufficient subscribers to enable the construction of the building on Jesus Lane. It featured an 18th-century-style façade with a small Ionic-columned portico. But once the baths opened they failed to attract enough customers and soon closed.

The distinctive premises were taken by the University Pitt Club. This had been founded in 1835 to honour the name of the former Prime Minister, William Pitt, to uphold the political principles for which he stood, and to ensure the return to parliament of Tory candidates. These objects were combined with the pleasures of dining and the drinking of numerous toasts which ranged from 'Church and State' – drunk to the tune of the Hallelujah Chorus – to 'the immortal memory of Mr Pitt' – drunk in silence. The last toast of the evening, the twenty-first on the list, was 'to our next merry meeting'

In 1843 the President of the club was summoned to appear before a committee of the House of Parliament to answer the charge of bribing voters during the Cambridge election; this was the end of the club's political role, but the dining continued. By the early 1960s it enjoyed an atmosphere of leisured ease with heavy leather chairs and sofas, making it the only comfortable and civilised club in Cambridge. With its air of formality and sartorial elegance it represented the gradually dying social class which once could afford and knew how to live hugely well.

But all of that had changed with the outbreak of the Second World War. In those dark days of rationing there was no place for luxury but there was a great need for a place where workers could obtain sustenance. British Restaurants were opened in Romsey Town, Chesterton and Cherry Hinton but it was the Pitt Club that was selected as the most suitable town-centre venue in 1942. Soon even undergraduates were deserting their college dining rooms to enjoy the fare offered by the two sisters who ran it, the Misses Tallerman. [SCAN 10091 - PITT CLUB PREMISES IN 1939]

After the war the Pitt Club wanted its building back and the Restaurant needed another site. It found it in the old Post Office building on the corner of Petty Cury. This had served as the headquarters of the Air Raid Precautions organisation and the Special Constabulary. Now rooms were adapted at considerable cost. In 1947 its status changed and it became a Civic Restaurant funded from the rates on the understanding that it could remain open as long as it did not run at a loss for three consecutive years. Soon it was actually producing profits for the council coffers. [SCAN 6480 THE SOUTH SIDE OF PETTY CURY FROM SIDNEY STREET SHOWING CIVIC RESTAURANT ON EXTREME LEFT, 1962]

Improvements were made in October 1954 with a new cafeteria counter with anti-sneeze glass, which protected the food from germs, and infra-red lamps that not only heated plates but kept the food warm. There was also a refrigerator top that made its own snow and maintained the salads and ice cream at a low degree.

The restaurant itself was redecorated to improve its ambience as much as possible, and this attracted more customers. By April 1961 its cooks were producing over 1,000 meals each day, Monday to Saturday, either for consumption on the premises or at the Drummer Street Mobile Canteen or Women's Voluntary Service 'Meals-on-wheels' service.

But while a reviewer approved of the good low cost food in 1966, he was less happy with the surroundings. "Every time I go into the main dining room I wonder if I have not wandered into some gloomy relic of Victorian railway architecture. The five foot-square towering columns which support the roof and the antique emergency brass lamp suspended from the ceiling help to give the cavernous interior of the main dinning room the appearance of a London railway station. It seems wholly out of keeping that with the forward attitude of the city council to modern design they should allow this gastronomic anachronism to continue in the heart of the city.” [SCAN 7951 – CUSTOMERS IN 1968]

I was then a young Librarian at the old Central Library behind the Guildhall and occasionally called in for beans on toast when I was on the late shift in the Reference department. But it was not my regular dining place – I preferred sandwiches in the little Library staff room where I could read old bound issues of ‘Punch’ as I munched.

But big changes were in the air: the old Post Office building, along with everything else on the south side of Petty Cury were due to be demolished for a new Lion Yard Shopping Centre. The end came in April 1972 when the Mayor of Cambridge, Coun Mrs Jean Barker – now Lady [OR IS IT BARONESS – PLEASE CHECK -]Trumpington – made a civic visit to the Civic Restaurant before it finally closed. The staff of about 30 joined her for a farewell cuppa; amongst them was Walter Waller who had been a handyman at the restaurant for 25 years and Nancy Philpott who had been one of the cooks for two decades.

Although the Civic was no more its memory lingered on. The Council had plans for a new restaurant in the church of St Andrew the Great, but estimates for the conversion work were put at £137,000. Then in 1974 they hoped to use the premises of the Lyons Restaurant in Petty Cury but it was sold for a dress shop. Councillors even looked at the possibility of turning the central library buildings in Wheeler Street into a Civic Restaurant after the library had moved to its new building in the Lion Yard. By August 1979 it was the Corn Exchange which became a candidate for conversion; once more it was not to be.

However premises just across Parsons Court have been turned into a ‘Pop In’ centre by Age Concern, providing a sociable meeting place for senior citizens where they can obtain both hot drinks and snacks and share with others memories of the good old days of the Civic Restaurant.

Our Time, April 2005 - Coldham’s Lane, by Mike Petty –.

When Sherlock Holmes made his way down Coldham’s Lane in pursuit of the ‘Missing Three Quarter’ he described a quiet grqss-grown lane; it is not a description one would apply today. By 1924 a councillor described it as “A veritable slough and almost impassable. There was an extraordinary amount of traffic and its condition had got to such a pitch that one ratepayer proposed to sow it with potatoes.” [SCAN 2504 – COLDHAM’S LANE 1880]

Then in July 1963 Erica Dimock made her own journey along the Lane for her ‘Down Your Street’ column in the Cambridge News. I have combined some of her observations with other notes to record an account of the history of this most busy of Cambridge roads “Coldham’s Lane will always retain its distinct town and country characteristics and those living at one end will remain totally different from those at the other”, Erica wrote. For the rural residents of the Cherry Hinton end were separated from their city brothers at the other by the airfield on one side and the cement works on the other.

In those days there was little in the way of amenities: Coldham’s Lane was served by two pubs, the Greyhound and the Rosemary Branch both of which ran darts and sick benefit savings clubs. There were few shops; Erica found the Orchard Stores, a grocery shop and a newsagent. But it did have Rosemary Nurseries in Cherry Hinton which had started in 1933 and specialised in cut flowers, raising 2,500 boxes of bedding plants which they supplied to the colleges.

The only other commercial enterprise as far as the general public was concerned was the Cambridge Automobiles Garage near the Newmarket Road junction who were agents for Morris and Singer cars. Nearby were distribution depots for Goodyear Tyres which stored up to 10,000 tyres of all types and sizes, Armstrong’s wholesale chemists and Cadbury’s and Fry’s the chocolate people.

The railway line across Coldham’s Common was laid out in 1896 to replace an older stretch of track that had run south of Mill Road. [SCAN 7154 DIGGING RAILWAY TRACK] In 1963 it delivered 200 tons of coal each day to sidings owned by the Eastern Gas Board where it was fed by a hopper into a fleet of lorries and taken to the Gas Works on Newmarket Road.

On the Newmarket Road side of the railway line at the turn of the century were the works of the Cambridge Brick Company. Fire broke out in July 1901 and the flames spread rapidly, soon mounting in the air a distance of about a hundred feet. In just over two hours all that remained was the damaged and broken parts of the valuable machinery. Fortunately the conflagration was confined to the corrugated iron roofed wooden building covering the machinery or the entire works could easily scarcely have escaped destruction. When the brickworks closed their deep pit became a rubbish dump and was bought in 1948 by Richard Duce for his scrap metal business. In 1963 Erica described acres of land covered with every kind of scrap metal imaginable, from old cars and lorries to bed irons, cans and weighing machines.

There were other scrap metal businesses nearby. One run by J.W. Galer specialised in machinery dismantling and had recently undertaken the demolition of a four-engine Wellington bomber while L.A. Rich specialised in motor vehicle demolition. His site was described as the ‘graveyard’ of many an old crock or new car which had been involved in an accident. It too had been ravaged by fire in July 1954. Burned stock included 10 cars, 200 wheels complete with tyres, a brick and asbestos carbide storage shed and a paraffin tanker. Luckily no petrol was stored there. Flames leapt up as high as the houses and car batteries exploded as hundreds of people watched the inferno.

Back by the railway another plot was occupied in 1963 by Commercial and Industrial Painters who were engaged in the painting and spraying of caravans. Not far away O.G. Lywood made ‘Car Cruiser’ caravans and other buildings used as mobile television studios or living units for oil prospectors in Libya. The site had previous been used by a laundry and earlier still a nine hole golf course which had opened in 1875.

Near the junction with Brooks Road was the Atlas Stone Company. The works had been completed in November 1903 for the manufacture of artificial paving slabs on the most up-to-date principles. By 1963 some 100 tons of concrete were made each day and used for the construction of such buildings as Churchill College and the new Addenbrooke’s Hospital

But the main industry was cement. There were reminders of the Saxon Works Portland Cement Company, erected in 1900. They had been one of the largest and most modern cement works in the country with railway sidings connected capable of holding three trains of 20 trucks each. The site included eight large cement kilns & an enormous storage building. Work continued by night and day lit by electricity generated at the works. By Erica's visit the Saxon works had gone leaving a lake which the Cambridge University Water Skiing Club shared with the Territorial Army Centre with its miniature rifle ranges, canteens and clubs.

Nearby the giant Norman Cement works was still producing 2,000 tons of concrete each week, employing some 85 people. Their works had been built in 1904, transforming the area: "Extensive new works are rapidly approaching completion and have made a great change in the landscape of Cherry Hinton. The pleasant path through the fields from the end of Mill Road is hardly recognisable now. It has been diverted to make room for a huge collection of buildings from which a new siding leads to the railway line close at hand. These are the Norman Cement Company's works" the News reported that November. By 1963 housewives were complaining that blue shirts were turning white because of the cement dust and the Company had installed new equipment to remedy the problem. Production ceased in 1984 and closed completely three years later. The site now houses a sports complex. [SCAN 7315 – PAINTING OF THE CEMENT WORKS PROBABLY 1920S – NB AM NOT POSITIVE WHICH ONE, PROBABLY THE SAXON – FUDGE CAPTION]

Another local enterprise was Andrew Pink's slaughterhouse. It had opened in July 1901 as the News reported: 'There is now in course of erection a new knackery where some 300 horses can be slaughtered daily at a minimum amount of pain. It stands in an isolated spot and is constructed on the most hygienic principles. In one corner is a large dissecting table and there are two huge coppers for boiling down the carcasses, the remains of which are subsequently sent away by rail. Some distance away is a tank ventilated with a shaft considerably higher than the top of the passenger carriages that may pass on the railway. The possibility of any offensive odour reaching travellers is thus quite obviated and the same care has been exhibited in regard to any unpleasantness that may arise from the boiling operations'. By 1963 it was providing the Blood Transfusion Centre with fresh horse blood and exporting meat to France and Belgium. They had also supplied large quantities of dehydrated meat to Dr Vivian Fuchs' Trans-Antarctic expedition on which the huskies were said to have thrived exceedingly well.

But of all the activities along Coldham's Lane it was what happened on Coldham's Common itself that gave most people concern. John Taylor lives in a cottage that was built in 1857 as a weigh bridge to enable the corporation to keep check on the amount of coprolite – fossilised organic matter which was dug up on the Common. The coprolite did not last forever and council later added two rooms to house the gatekeeper for the Common. She was Elizabeth Layton - her initials were carved into the end wall. She ended up in the Workhouse. [FIND NEWS PICTURE OF WEIGH HOUSE]

But when John first moved a neighbour had asked if he'd seen the ghost yet? Nearly 20 years later he was having some extensions done: "I was levelling the lawn when the fork struck something hard. It turned out to be an oddly coloured stone". He contacted the County Archaeologist who identified part of a 14th century tombstone. It had probably been placed there when stone was cleared from Barnwell Abbey in 1810. But who had been buried under it – and who is the ghost?

During a Great Plague in 1665/6 a Pest House was erected on the Common where 216 people died. Their bodies were loaded on to the plague cart and buried somewhere nearby in 'the dead of night'. Then in 1902 smallpox struck Cambridge and victims were transferred to huts and tents erected in Coldham's Lane. Not all got well as the News of 28th August 1903 makes clear: "During the recent heavy rains the beds in the tents were surrounded by water and the deaths that have occurred there have been caused by cold and not by smallpox, as reported.”

Other houses were constructed during the depression years of the 1920s and in 1927 the Council were offering to sell houses in Coldham’s Lane for five pounds down & the balance in weekly instalments. Those who could afford to pay such amounts were urged to contact the Treasurer.

Summing up her article in 1963 Erica considered what the future held for Coldham’s Lane and its residents; nobody was sure but it did not seem likely to change very much for a good many years to come, she concluded. How wrong could she be.

A few years later and plans were submitted to build a shopping centre on Mr Duce’s scrapyard. They fell through but in 1968 a development company bought the site for storage warehouses. Four years later they sold it on. In December 1973 a 160-foot high chimney that dominated the area was demolished and a new Coral Park Estate was created on the site.
[SCAN T1718 CLEARING THE SITE]

In 1969 it was the turn of the Co-operative Society to challenge county planning restrictions on the use of former Cadbury warehouse site. They erected the Beehive discount warehouse for bulk sales and then won permission to open it to the public, opening the way for further development.

There was change too on the Atlas Stone Works on the corner with Brooks Road. In 1972 Sainsburys announced plans for a major supermarket development on the site. “We believe that edge of town developments are the thing of the future” they said. The planners were less sure and rejected the scheme but were again overruled by the Government. It opened at the time of a national shortage of sugar in December 1974 and was almost overwhelmed with customers. The car park was filled, and the traffic jams built up to such an extent that the police were called to help to get things moving again.

Now the cement works and brickworks that once dominated the area have gone; the airfield too may soon relocate but whatever the future it is unlikely ever that Coldham’s Lane will ever revert to the quiet grass-grown status Sherlock Holmes explored.

And who was the Mr Coldham after whom the Lane was named – according to the street-names experts there never was one; the name dates back to medieval times and means ‘cold hamlet’.

VE AND VJ IN CAMBRIDGESHIRE, by Mike Petty –.

It can be difficult, 60 years on, to differentiate between photographs of the celebrations for VE Day and VJ Day in 1945. It can be difficult too to appreciate just what agony people had to go through between those two celebrations, one to mark Victory in Europe, the second Victory against Japan.

1945 had started badly on the Home Front with a bitter January and February. People had become heartily sick of the war and weary of shortages of every. Rationing was more severe than ever. On the War Front the success of D-Day in June 1944 had been followed by the liberation of Paris. As the months passed Mussolini was killed by Italian partisans and the German army in Italy surrendered. The British Army crossed the Rhine, the Russians reached Berlin, Hitler committed suicide on April 30th and Germany capitulated on May 7th.

News broke in Cambridge during the Monday afternoon and several thousand students assembled on the Market Square; there was singing, dancing and cheering while home-made 'thunder flashes' and cracker-jacks added to the liveliness of the evening and a waste-paper dump in St Mary's Passage became a bonfire.

Tuesday May 8th was proclaimed VE Day and was marked by services of thanksgiving in churches throughout the county.

By now Cambridge streets were decorated with flags and bunting and thronged with thousands of people making their way into the centre. Once the service at Great St Mary's had ended it was time for music and dancing on the market cobbles as the crowds waited for the Mayor to make the official declaration. Then they followed the Cadet and Home Guard bands in a torchlight procession that toured the town en route to Midsummer Common where effigies of Hitler, Himmler and Goebbels were consigned to a bonfire. It was followed by dancing well into the night to the glow of the flames and the light of half-a-dozen searchlight beams which were lowered as the bonfire burned down. At midnight the bands fell silent to be replaced by a deafening cheer for the men still fighting in the Far East..

In Ely Les Oakey recalls that Tom Kempton from the Radio Relay service rigged up loudspeakers on the Market Place and after some initial hesitation dancing took place. It was not until the arrival of the RAF from Witchford and the RAF Hospital, with the co-operation of the Land Army girls from the St Mary's Street hostel, that a spirit of jollity manifested itself. The RAF brought with them a Vickers pistol and cartridges with which they lit up the night sky. A dance was hastily arranged for the Corn Exchange and the public houses soon ran out of beer. Formal commemoration came when 3,000 people formed a vast congregation at the special services of thanksgiving held in the cathedral, preceded and followed by a great parade watched by dense crowds along the streets – blue and khaki, civil defence and nursing services marched under waving flags

Across the county the story was the same. Wisbech went mad: flags and decorated streets and people sang and danced until well into the night, whilst fireworks mysteriously appeared, bonfires blazed and sudden noises and bangs - which would once have given cause for alarm - became commonplace. At St Neots the town echoed to the sound of hammering as men festooned the streets with flags, and two American Military Policemen with white helmets and white spats patrolled the town before the carnival got under way. In St Ives the statue of Oliver Cromwell was decorated with a dustbin lid, at Ramsey a chair was fixed to the church steeple, and a WAAF climbed the war memorial at Huntingdon to put a cigarette in the statue's lips.

Freddie Barrett recorded how at Girton villagers were out early on the morning of VE day hanging flags of all shapes and sizes and bunting made from scraps of coloured material. At mid-day while people assembled for a united service of thanksgiving in the church the air above them was filled with the roar of heavily-loaded Lancaster bombers. This time they were weighed-down not with bombs but with food to be dropped to Holland where the dikes had been breached and the people were starving. The evening was given over to a children's social with games, dancing and community singing, then as darkness descended a large pile of wood and straw, topped with an effigy of Hitler holding a swastika flag was set alight and flames rose to the height of the church. Fireworks were lit and Captain Game of the Home Guard created loud bangs as people joined hands and danced around the fire. Then they made their way to the Women's Institute Hall for more dancing to music supplied by the Youth Centre radio-gram.

At Comberton there were sports and a fancy dress parade with a free dance at the Village Institute followed by a large bonfire on the cross-roads during which the Police and A.R.P. hut, which consisted mainly of baled straw, was reduced to ashes. Great and Little Abington saw a parade of Home Guard, Red Cross, Women's Land Army, Civil Defence, National Fire Service and Special Constabulary and church services were packed. In Great Shelford the inhabitants of The Crescent organised a programme of games and piles of sandwiches while Mrs Day's piano was installed on the Green to enliven proceedings with lively and popular tunes.

At Newton the cross-roads were floodlit and a large bonfire on the Green was lit by Gordon Rogers, a returned prisoner-of-war, while a loudspeaker relayed dance music to those who preferred dancing in the road to the warmth of the Village Rooms. Over saw a parade of tractors and lorries loaded with people in fancy dress with dancing, sports and a cricket match between ladies and gentlemen.

It was a scene repeated throughout the county in those first days of peace. But celebrations did not end then.

In the weeks that followed more street parties were organised. Jeffrey Barham remembers how in his part of Cambridge committees of parents decided where the parties would be held and which children should go to which party. (If you were lucky, you managed to get to two!). Tables laden with food saved from carefully hoarded rations were set up in the streets which had been decorated with bunting and Union Jacks. There were games and entertainments, both from professionals and amateurs. A usual feature was the fancy dress parade when miniature Betty Grables were whistled at, Hitlers booed and Winston Churchills cheered. A wind-up gramophone was inevitably found to provide music for grown-ups to dance to, long after the children were in bed.

In Fulbourn the children living in School Lane, Cambridge and Shelford Roads were invited to a victory party on June 16th in School Lane which was specially decorated for the occasion. 104 youngsters sat down to a good meal and were afterwards entertained in the Memorial Hall by a comedian, Mr R.F. Crick, of Cambridge. Those children who missed out had their VE tea in the Memorial Hall a few weeks later when 180 sat down to bread and butter, sandwiches, various cakes and ice creams. Later children of all ages took part in races, musical chairs, fancy dress, singing and dancing. The evening ended with a dance for parents until midnight.

But at Fridaybridge near Wisbech they decided not to hold any public celebration of Victory in Europe, though there were thanksgiving services and they did permit themselves a whist drive in conjunction with the nearby Prisoner of War camp.

For as James de Rothchild, the Isle of Ely Member of Parliament remarked: "The men and women of the Eastern counties realise that the war is not yet at an end, when so many of the gallant Cambridgeshire regiment who fought against such odds in the first unequal battles of the East; your husbands, your sons, are still in the foul hands of the Japanese. Let us give thanks, heartfelt and reverent, for the Victory we have won but let us resolve that we will deal with tyranny in the East as effectually as we have dealt with it in the West”

The Cambridgeshire Regiment had sailed for Singapore in 1941 and had played their part in the final defence of the fortress, impregnable against attack from the sea, indefensible against land attack. Its surrender in the face of overwhelming odds had been one of the low points of the war. They had been taken into captivity and had disappeared. While the rest of the world celebrated Victory in Europe there was still little news of their fate.

The Japanese were battling on but now with the Americans advancing on their homeland, island by island it was Japan's turn to experience the horror of bombing from the air. Raid followed raid with devastating effect. Then on August 6th an Atom bomb was dropped on Hiroshima, three days later another destroyed Nagasaki. On August 11th Japan surrendered.

The surrender of Japan was announced at midnight on Tuesday 14th August and was received with jubilation.

At Ely while many heard the broadcast at midnight there were many more for whom the first intimation of great tidings came about an hour later. They were awakened by the sounds of singing in the streets by a party of RAF & WRAF personnel to the accompaniment of a drum and cornet with an occasional obligato on door-knockers. They paraded many of the streets of the city and by the time they decided to disband about two o'clock there could have been few people who were not awake.

In Cambridge too most folk were abed when the news of the surrender broke but some did venture into the streets. Undergraduates started a small bonfire on Market Hill but the timely arrival of a police officer ensured that the market stalls themselves survived. Soon 100 people had gathered laughing, cheering and occasionally bursting into song whilst one driver in a sports car drove round and round sounding the V for victory call on his hooter. By breakfast time flags and bunting began to flutter in the streets. Anxious housewives turned out in strength to make sure the larders should be sufficiently stocked over the VJ holiday period. As the morning drew on there were more people about, hundreds grew into thousands as parents carried children shoulder high and the Union Jacks, rosettes and paper hats reappeared. It was VE Day all over again and once more thousands of people converged on Market Hill. At midday the sound of bugles heralded the arrival of the Mayor who made the formal announcement that the war was indeed over. The Railway Band played music of the Great War before marching through crowded streets to Parker's Piece for community singing and fireworks with 10,000 people dancing, pushing and talking despite the drizzle. At nine o'clock they fell silent to hear the King's speech broadcast by loudspeakers followed by the singing of the National Anthem.

Thursday August 16th was proclaimed to be VJ Day. In Cambridge the highlight was a Grand Patriotic Concert in the Guildhall but the customary bonfire was almost a non-event as there seemed to be no scrap timber left over anywhere. However a Mr Marshall managed to acquire some and the Mayor was able to light the kindling at nine o'clock. There then followed another round of street parties, concerts and miscellaneous junketing

At Burwell most houses were decorated but the most outstanding was that of Mr Knights in the High Street whose windows were surrounded with red, white and blue fairy lights. At Gamlingay VJ Day passed off quietly but a programme for children was arranged for later in the week. Gt Wilbraham organised a party for the children of Station Road with blancmanges and an iced Victory cake; it was further enlivened when a clown appeared.

At Fulbourn an impromptu Victory celebration was arranged for the village children when about 200 kiddies enjoyed themselves. There was a fancy dress parade, races and a comic cricket match between boys and girls. Fireworks added to the excitements and in the evening there was a social with dancing to end the day.

Quy children were treated to a tea with games and races and a bonfire on the cricket field. Kitty Watts described what happened in a letter to her daughter Peggy: "Don Harvey made a wonderful bomb with petrol, gunpowder etc in it and the kiddies got so excited. We called them all away on to the road when they lit the long fuse, but it was a failure, all it did was flare well and plenty of black smoke so they got well teased about their wonderful bomb". Other celebrations followed: "They are having another tea tomorrow, Aut Beat is making jellies, Roff up the top road has sent lots of cake and buns and other people are sending things and quite a lot of money so they seem to be doing something at Quy this time for a change"

But Victory celebrations in many villages were tinged with restraint. The joyous news of the defeat of Japan was tempered with the thought of so many of Cambridgeshire's sons still in Far East prisoner of war camps and relatives were anxious for news of their well-being before celebrating.

In September came news: 35,000 prisoners had been released on Singapore Island alone, others were in camps inland, still more in Saigon. Stories emerged of the grim conditions the Cambridgeshire men had experienced as prisoners and so did the first photographs of strangers, thin, gaunt and haggard almost unrecognisable as sons and husbands.

On October 7th the first batch of Cambridgeshire Regiment men arrived back at Southampton on board the "Corfu". First back to Wisbech was Ronald Wilson of the Royal Norfolk Regiment who made the journey by air. For him there was no civic reception when he arrived just after midnight one Sunday. But crowds thronged the station to give other men a rousing welcome with the Salvation Army band playing; there were cheers - and tears - as boys were hugged and kissed by their overjoyed relatives. It was a scene repeated elsewhere as villages welcomed their own heroes home and began to realise just how many were missing.

On November 11th the men of the Cambridgeshire Regiment were marching again on Remembrance Sunday and silence descended over the county as church clocks struck the 11th hour and the county honoured its dead wherever they'd fallen in whatever conflict.

By the time it came for the final parties of the year – those to celebrate Christmas 1945 - many homes were happier than they had been for several years but others were realising that Christmas would never be the same again

Grafton Centre by Mike Petty – Our Time, May 2005

Cambridge's Grafton Centre was one of the most controversial shopping developments in the city's history. It was a titanic struggle heralded by a County Planning Report of 1950 and closed by opponents finally conceding defeat amid a welter of construction in May 1981

In the interim there were proposals, counter-proposals, repeated promises of an 'early start', back-pedalling, alternative schemes elsewhere and the emergence of rival developments. Added to this came Government summits, college interventions, inter-council wrangling, critical missives from the Ombudsman and a general smokescreen of doubt.

The major post-war Holford report of 1950 suggested that the historic centre of Cambridge would be unable to meet all the shopping needs of the future and suggested Fitzroy Street as a valuable relief for that increasing pressure. Much of the area consisted of out-dated two-storey cottages with extensive yards and was largely a slum. Redevelopment was due and could be undertaken without the restrictions of historical associations and high land values.

At the same time debate was also raging over proposals for the redevelopment of the area around Petty Cury. The University favoured amenities such as a library, concert hall and art gallery whilst the City Council favoured a large pedestrianised shopping centre. Throughout the 1960s plans and counter-plans were produced until the south side of Petty Cury was demolished to make way for what was hailed as the largest redevelopment scheme since the war, if we omit the blitzed cities.

But the City Council also wanted to redevelop the Fitzroy Street area for shopping and commissioned Lord Llewellyn Davies to prepare a scheme. His report was eventually published four years later and caused uproar in all sectors because of the massive scale of building and development which it proposed. As a result the Council looked for other developers to suggest alternative schemes.

Amongst them was a report by Professor Parry Lewis who concluded that any such scheme would impact on the City Centre and that new commercial development should be on the edge of the city. Even the Cambridge Evening News who had previously criticised planning inaction now urged caution and the debate developed into an acrimonious battle.

In such a climate of uncertainty the Fitzroy Street area was suffering from planning blight. Neither shop owners nor residents were sufficiently confident in the future to undertake repairs to their properties. As walls crumbled, slates slid and windows became broken so businesses shut up shop and families moved out.

The Kite Community Action Group was formed to try and stop the building of a monolithic shopping centre on its doorstep. It felt that any redevelopment should be on the basis of piecemeal reconstruction within the context of the existing structure. They organised marches and fund-raising shows backed by celebrities such as Clive James and Michael Palin. But as debate dragged on and on the area's largest shop, Laurie and McConnal, took the decision to close down in 1977, blaming indecision over the Kite redevelopment. The closure shocked councillors.

Finally a plan put forward by Grosvenor Estates Commercial Development was accepted. It proposed 'a scheme of quality and character sensitively integrated with the neighbourhood shopping and residential areas.' Eventually work began in August 1981.

The new Grafton Centre was opened by the Queen in May 1984. It featured several big shops such as Debenhams and C&A. which previously had no foothold in Cambridge together with a supermarket – Presto – although this closed four years later. Within four years the centre was felt to be already too small and more shops with a huge Warner cinema complex were added. Additional expansion has made it even bigger until today it offers a wide range of big-name shops and attracts thousands of shoppers.

But now in 2005 another large-scale redevelopment is taking place in the City Centre as the Lion Yard is extended with a Grand Arcade. What impact this will have on the Grafton Centre remains to be seen.

Mock Funerals – by Mike Petty

Funerals are usually sombre affairs; mourners follow the hearse with reverence and the deceased despatched with due dignity

But undergraduates sent down for committing some breach of University discipline were once given a more rousing send off in a tradition known as a Mock Funeral which had little of the solemnity normally associated with such a traumatic event. Cambridge ground to a halt as a motley procession of cabs and carriages made its way to the station for the train that was to take the ‘departed’ away.

Various such ‘funerals’ have been reported over the years.

In February 1899 a young man was convicted by the authorities of Queens’ College for having ‘ragged’ a couple of Freshmen’s rooms and ‘sent down’ for a year. The ‘body’ was carried in an open landau occupied by three young men who wore ‘the trappings of woe’ very lightly. Following were nearly a score of hansom cabs. Before the train left the company whistled the “Dead March” and the lad departed amid ringing cheers.

In March 1904 St John’s College students carried out a mock funeral for an undergraduate who had been ejected from the New Theatre on three occasions in one week for having disrupted the performance. The college authorities had decided he should be ‘sent down’ and his friends organised a procession of eight cabs which filed along the streets at funereal pace to the railway station with undergraduates sitting on the roofs of the vehicles. A halt was made in Sidney Street for a photograph to be taken and another outside the New Theatre to allow the travellers to indicate their disapproval of the management. The scene was also recorded by a local cartoonist, Harry Moden, and issued as a postcard.[SCAN 104.66 – THE MOCK FUNERAL LINING UP OUTSIDE ST JOHN’S COLLEGE; SCAN 52.44 THE PROCESSION AS SEEN BY CARTOONIST HARRY MODEN]

Sometimes the grads went too far and offence was caused in 1910 when the cortege included members of the Cambridge University Officer Training Corps in uniform and with rifles reversed. This was thought to be in bad form since it was soon after the funeral of King Edward VII. Another followed in 1911 when a Trinity Hall undergraduate was sent down for disciplinary offence, this time there were 100 horse & motor vehicles in the procession behind a brass band on a coal wagon. [SCAN 89.17 – THE 1911 MOCK FUNERAL IN HILLS ROAD] Others were held in March 1912 and February 1913 [SCAN 104.63 THE 1913 MOCK FUNERAL IN HILLS ROAD] after which the Vice-Chancellor took steps to suppress them. [SCAN 104.67 A MOCK FUNERAL IN HILLS ROAD – NOT SURE WHICH ONE!]

But it was too good a tradition to be abandoned and when the old horse-drawn tramways went into liquidation in 1914 the final tram was escorted to its depot on East Road by undergraduates in mourning attire chanting a funeral dirge.

The mock funerals lapsed during the years of the Great War but came back with a vengeance in 1920. The atmosphere of the occasion was well captured by a report in the Cambridge Daily News:

“Tears flowed like rivers in the streets of Cambridge. Feeble old gentlemen were washed away. Aged ladies were borne almost as far as the Gogs by the onrushing flood of ‘tears, idle tears'. A plaintive lament ascended to heaven. Bagpipes droned mournfully; tin whistles shrieked with a despairing note. And in the midst of the mourning the Body was conveyed, under the respectful gaze of the weeping multitude, to the station.

For it was a Mock Funeral – sonorous and dolorous words! A Caius man had met his doom; on Monday he went down – down into darkness, through the gloomy portals of the Cambridge Railway Station.

The news had gone forth, and as the gilded hands of the gilded Guildhall clock drew near the hour of eleven, mysterious streams of undergraduates converged on to the Market Place, and gathered outside Mason's Café. Inside the Café there was a 'certain liveliness'; now and again a 'woman' would look out of the windows, and be greeted with what Walt Whitman would call 'mocking, ironic laughter'.

Then came the Cab, drawn by a small and weary horse, and driven by an imperturbable driver.

The doors were flung open. Forth came the Parson with white ascetic face and eyes staring with pious horror at the shrieking crowd. Forth came the Undertaker, with his staff of office in hand; he ignored the populace. Forth came the Body, borne on a board and covered with a sheet; slowly and sadly it was laid down in the cab. And after that there emerged from the doorway an endless stream of mourners; there were beautiful 'maidens' with dresses cut at the back down to the waist – (what did it matter that leather braces encircled their bare shoulders?). There were ancient women; there were men with beards that a Bolshevik might be proud of. There was a man who wore a tin hat, and who bore a banner with the strange device: 'No flowers, by request'

After the mourners came the choir; multitudes without number! There were Bolsheviks with flutes, men in pyjamas, men wearing coats turned inside out, a maiden or two.

The mourners ascended the cab, and wept copiously over the Corpse. In front of the cab was a procession of uproarious undergraduates; in front of the procession was the surpliced choir, led by the parson and the undertaker. A second choir followed the cab, and after them came 'the common herd, the rabble, the low people'

The bagpipes and the tin whistles and the mouth organs struck up the Dead March and amid scenes of the utmost pathos and most affecting grief the Mock Funeral started.

The parson led the way along Market Street and St Andrew's Street, and the solemnity of his countenance did not change even when the choir struck up 'Yip-i-addy'. Then followed a medley of hymns and comic songs.

But why did that faint sound come from the bottom of the cab? Could the corpse be growing restive?

At the Catholic Church the various dirges were stopped and the parson read the first lesson. Unfolding his hands from beneath his baby's bib (which had the charming inscription, 'My Darling') he opened a Gray's Anatomy, and, casting his eyes to heaven, announced that 'this morning's lesson' was taken 'from the plumph verse to the umpteenth verse'. The procession chanted 'Amen'. His reverence then read (though rudely interrupted by many deep chants of 'Amen') an inspiring and thrilling passage dealing with muscles and ending with the uplifting words: 'And the measurement is one and one-seventh millimetres'.

It was with downcast faces and upcast voices that the procession re-started, and marched along Hills Road. But alas! Too much grief had driven the fair mourner mad, for why did she stare so saucily at the multitude? And why below her flowing golden locks did there peep that fringe of ginger hair? And why, O why, did the onlookers burst into great sobs (the uninitiated might have thought they were great guffaws) at the sight of the placards borne by the choir: 'Glovemore and Rusher, undertakers', 'R.I.P.', 'Toll for the Brave'?

At the corner of Station Road the second lesson was read by his reverence, whose voice thrilled with simple faith and unclouded belief as he read St Gray's Sermon on the Blood Vessels of the Heart. Then the procession reformed, and with solemn step and slow, and to the accompaniment of the 'Death of Poor Cock Robin', marched to the station.

The choir proceeded on to the platform; the body was borne into the gloomy station, but (perhaps staggered by the ugliness of it) suddenly sat up, and had to be admonished in righteous indignation by the bearers. Surrounded by the swarming crowd of undergraduates, the body was conveyed into the guard's van of a train; the parson read the third lesson (the Epistle on the Lungs); the 'undertaker' climbed on to the top of the train and 'knocked the nails in the coffin' with brooms. Everyone cheered and laughed and sang.

But a horrible suspicion grew on the waiting hundreds of undergraduates. Where was the Corpse? It was not in the guard's van. It had gone.

The undergraduates swarmed through the train, over or through the train standing next to it, and so on to the opposite platform. But the Corpse had gone ...

The multitude rushed out of the station, thirsting for blood. They saw a 'bus; it was instantly covered with undergraduates; they swarmed up the sides and over the front, and hung on in incredible places. The solid tyres of the 'bus were flattened. Then another 'bus coming from the town, turned into Station Yard, even while it was still swinging round it was crammed with festive young men. And after a few of them had been hurled from both the 'buses the drivers drove the rest away.

Meanwhile the Corpse – now very much alive – and the mourners and most of the choir were marching more or less solemnly back towards the Market Place.

The 'buses joined the procession; motors were mingled with the stream of undergraduates – in one of them was a fair mourner – 'Dora' – with 'her' leg over the side. The choir sang with enthusiasm; the bagpipes piped; the undergraduates roared. Policemen solemnly led the procession.

At the Post Office his reverence read another lesson, and a collection was taken for the Corpse. On the Market Hill the fifth lesson was read, his reverence being bombarded with coppers until he took shelter under an umbrella.

The Mock Funeral concluded with the announcement that 'This correspondence must now cease!'

There was a variation on the theme in 1921 when the University authorities were considering whether to award degrees to women. A colossal mock funeral was held for 'The death of the Varsity' with the 'corpse' of 'the last male undergraduate' being borne on a bier surrounded by aged mourners whose long grey beards dragged in the dust.

Then in May 1926 a mock funeral was arranged for two Trinity men who had been sent down for a breach of college discipline. The procession made its way to the college to collect the 'corpses' but on arrival however they found their unfortunate colleagues had made use of their newly-acquired wings and flown. Nothing daunted the party proceeded to the station headed by a drum-major and a figure in clerical attire. Amongst the occupants of the horse-drawn 'hearse' were two musical geniuses with a banjo and saxophone.

Four years later came another. Once more it was headed by an old horse-drawn landau in which the 'corpse' sat, his face disguised beneath a war-paint of lipstick. He was joined by various persons who were to officiate at the ceremony; beneath top hats, black cloches and wideawakes were suits of grey flannel, blazers and plus-fours. All were garnished in crepe streamers on which hung rhubarb, beer and wine bottles, remains of the 'wake'. At the station the funeral party moved along the platform hilariously singing a dirge and the 'corpse' was installed in a third-class compartment where gifts of fruit and rhubarb were handed solemnly in. Another was in 1962 when two undergraduates were sent down for failing their examinations. This time their sports car was pulled through the streets by their mourning colleagues and despite the stir it caused it was reckoned only a poor affair compared to the elaborate ones of the past. Who knows whether the streets of Cambridge will ever see such sights again?

River Cam Boat trip

River Cam Boat Trip script, July 2007 by Mike Petty

A boat trip on the River Cam has been a treat for generations of Cambridge folk over the years. What could be nicer than a gentle cruise down the tranquil stream through a peaceful landscape to banish stress and escape from the tragedy that seems to dominate the headlines.

But the River Cam has not always been so peaceful; it has a dark history of drama round every bend.

Jesus Lock

It is hard to visualise picturesque Jesus Green with its sluice, footbridge and lock as a bustling commercial area. But in Victorian times the waterfall was nicknamed 'Niagara' and the original bridge rose high above locks which were busy with boats. The lock was built in 1832 as one of a number that had to be constructed to maintain the essential river trade on which Cambridge depended. There were proposals for Jesus Green to be the start of a new canal down to Bishop Stortford and London. This would save the long journey of goods on seagoing vessels from the Thames around the coast of East Anglia to the port of Kings Lynn where they were offloaded into river-going craft to bring to Cambridge. But the canal was never built and narrowboats that now line the banks did not become part of the Cambridge scene

Barges and boats

For centuries it was barges that brought the necessities of daily life such as coal, timber, bricks, butter, cheese. Much of this was transported through the locks to unload at Quayside while other barges would pass along the Backs to Mill Pool. The barges were pulled by horses which walked the towpath alongside the river. As time progressed the horses were replaced by steam tugs such as the Cutter and Nancy which continued until the First World War. Another tugboat, the Olga, continued pulling barges up to the gasworks until 1933.

As commercial trade declined the river began to be used for pleasure craft. Some enthusiasts ran their own steamboats while others preferred cabin cruisers. But more people enjoyed river trips on excursion boats. These included the horse-drawn Victoria and Albert and the steam-powered Otter that towed the Otter Hound. But the most famous party-boat was the Viscountess Bury. Launched as a battery-powered vessel in 1888 and patronised by Edward VII, it was bought to Cambridge by H.C.Banham in 1910 where it was fitted with a petrol engine and regularly used for club outings and private festivities. Now she too is just a memory with craft like the Riverboat Georgina continuing the tradition.

Victoria Bridge

Victoria Bridge is a monument to a battle. It was built as a bribe to the people of the rapidly growing New Chesterton to give up their independence and become part of an expanded Cambridge. Suggestions for amalgamation had received a cool response so as a dowry Cambridge suggested a new road bridge avoiding the long trudge to Magdalene Bridge. An Act of Parliament was obtained and in November 1889 the Mayor of Cambridge and Chairman of the Chesterton Local Board jointly laid the foundation stone. By December 1890 it was ready. The opening ceremony was not conducted without a hitch: suspended across the bridge was a bottle of champagne on a ribbon. When the ribbon was cut the champagne was to smash against the parapet to christen the new structure. To everybody embarrassment the bottle failed to break. The bribe also failed and Chesterton retained its independence until 1912. By 1986 the bridge was found to be rusting away and in need of urgent repairs which took as long to complete as the Victorians had taken to build it.

Midsummer Common

The new Victoria Avenue carried traffic across Midsummer Common, destroying the tranquillity of the area. But it was not always tranquil. It is home to one of the best-known fairs in the country & whilst cows and horses regularly graze the common there have been other animals too: "With the big top a blaze of coloured lights, people streamed to Midsummer Common to fill Chipperfields' Circus to capacity. It is the first time any circus has presented such a varied collection of animals, which include camels, llamas, zebras, a giraffe and Indian pythons. The seals balance balls, the poodles rode a pony round the ring and one of the elephants even did a handstand", reporters noted in March 1955.

Some animals are less attractive, as this story from 1904 shows: "Ratting is a form of amusement which dates back to the dim ages; in Cambridge ratting parties are to be seen on Midsummer Common on Sundays. The undergraduate takes a great pride in the sporting qualities of his "dawg's" pedigree, half-bred or mongrel, and certain townees feed this pride by collecting a supply of rats for the alleged sporting dogs to worry. With stout wire cages slung on their backs the dealers await the arrival of undergraduates and then offer rats at a "bob apiece". Rat after rat is released from the cage, given half a dozen yards start, and then the dogs "course" it to its death. The slaughter over the dead rats are piled on the common to fester and rot."

It was not the only hazard people might encounter. In 1929 a dredger was hard at work deepening the Cam and depositing the spoil on the Common. The News how: "A young Cambridge lady in attempting to make a short cut across Midsummer Common became embedded in the half-frozen silt and mud thrown up by the dredger. Another lady went to her assistance and suffered a similar fate. Their frantic signals soon attracted the attention of passers-by; two or three young men waded out to them while others formed a human chain.

The would-be rescuer was extricated with little difficulty but the first lady became more deeply embedded. Eventually a ladder was procured and a rescue effected. Fortunately no bones were broken but she was so badly shaken up by her ordeal that she had to be removed on a hastily-improvised stretcher” [SCAN 6825 – DREDGER AT WORK ON THE CAM 1929]

Boathouses

Beyond the bridge the river is lined with boathouses. Rowing as an undergraduate sport dates back to 1825 when St John's college boat club was established to be followed shortly afterwards by the First Trinity. Soon other colleges joined the fray and the number of boathouses along the stretch of river opposite Midsummer Common increased.

Fort St George

The Fort St George in England has been fortifying residents and visitors for over 500 years; once it stood on its own island and was approached by a bridge across a lock now superseded by that at Jesus Green.

Ferries and Footbridges

Several ferries crossed the river along this stretch; the ferryman turned a handle which engaged a chain that ran across the bed of the river. But once the ferryman had gone off for the night people had to operate it for themselves. The ferry seemed always to be on the wrong side of the river so you had to pull on the slimy chain to bring it to your side of the bank; then sometimes it got stuck midstream. They were the scene of numerous accidents and even drownings. By 1904 residents of the new houses on the De Freville Estate were agitating for footbridges.

In 1913 the Borough council agreed that a bridge was indeed necessary at Ferry Path, though it was another 14 years before it actually opened. William Pauley had operated a ferry here since 1887 and carried an estimated one-and-a-quarter-million passengers. Those waiting to make a last nostalgic crossing were disappointed when the ferry sank just before the new bridge opened.

Further downstream the Cutter ferry was operated by the Dant family. One had the nickname ‘Cuckoo’ as he took to his bed when the cold weather came and would not get up till spring. Children gathered under his window and called ‘Cuckoo’ to make him think that it was time to bestir himself.

In July 1929 it was superseded by a footbridge, known as Pye Bridge - but the design did not appeal to everybody, as a correspondent complained: “At five minutes to eight every morning the instrument workers at Pye’s are hurrying to work from the other side of the river. They curse and groan, trip and stagger under the burden of carrying their bicycles up and down a steep double flight of steps. Sooner or later some panting person carrying a bicycle will fall backwards or pitch into the river. But it is quite as much a death trap for pedestrians: the steps are much too steep”. In 1932 the bridge had to be closed while the approaches were reconstructed and the ferry was brought back into use once more. Now in 2005 a new replacement bridge has been opened which will hopefully ease the situation.

Banham’s Boatyard

There were also boatyards where firms such H.C. Banham constructed the rowing eights used by University and college crews as well as motor cruisers some of which they hired out holidaymakers to explore the fenland waters.

Elizabeth Bridge

Almost as soon as Victoria Bridge had opened agitation started for another one. But while some petitioned for a new crossing others argued against it because of the traffic congestion it would bring to Chesterton. After years of debate Elizabeth Bridge was opened in July 1971, though not without a hitch. This time the official ceremony was performed by the Master of Trinity College, Lord Butler. Once more disaster struck. After the speeches had been delivered he stepped forward to cut the ceremonial ribbon with the gold scissors – only to find that they would not cut! To everybody's embarrassment it took several hacks before the ribbon parted.

Sewage and Gas Works

Once beyond Elizabeth Bridge one is into Riverside, but in the past this was not an area to linger.

By 1864 the Cam was described as 'an elongated cesspool' with sewage flowing into it from the Colleges along the Backs. The stench could be terrible, especially on warm summer afternoons and something had to be done. For the next 30 years the Council talked about it but in 1895 a new sewage pumping station was constructed at Cheddar's Lane. Here all kinds of household refuse were burnt to produce steam which was used to pump the sewage to a farm at Milton Road. This had an immediate impact on the health of Cambridge and because of bad workmanship was said also to have improved the climate. Due to a lack of care when laid the pipes were laid they cracked & water was drawn in from the surrounding soil. It transformed Cambridge from a damp place to dry & healthy one. The problem was that the extra water overloaded the system. It still did not prevent sewage overflowing into the river during heavy storms & in the 1960s local residents took up their carpets & piled furniture upstairs when they went holiday. A new Riverside pumping station was opened in 1968 and major new works put in place to cope with even more demand. The old works now house the Cambridge Museum of Technology.

Gas

Gas arrived in Cambridge in the 1820s a gasworks built beside the river where it could easily be supplied by barge. In 1867 railway sidings were constructed in Coldham's Lane but ammonia produced at the plant continued to be sent by barge to King's Lynn until 1933

The works were not an unmitigated benefit to the area; in January 1870 a large gasholder was blown down in a gale and the gas caught fire. By 1876 there were protests of 'noxious vapours destroying vegetation in the neighbourhood' to which the Gas Company replied that "If it is imagined that the production of Gas can be conducted to yield nothing but pleasant odours, then the complainants are very much mistaken". The complaints would not go away: in June 1951 residents complained of dust from the works. One produced a sugar bag half filled with dust collected in his house in one week. Another said she could not put her children in a pram in the garden because of it. To this a Gas Board official said the works were one of the cleanest in the country. In 1968 North Sea gas arrived and next year the works ceased production after 140 years.

Chesterton

Old Chesterton was once a quaint little village on the edge of Cambridge but it expanded after the inclosure acts opened up the fields to building. It has not always been a peaceful place:

In 1579 the village lads challenged a number of university students to a friendly football match near the church. Just to reassure their opponents that things would stay friendly they arranged for the chief constable of Chesterton, Thomas Parish, to be there. However they also armed themselves with wooden staves which they hid in the church porch. The game started well enough but then somebody started a quarrel. Out came the staves and they walloped into the students, breaking their heads and sending them running through the river in an attempt to get away. When the students turned to the constable and urged him to do his duty and keep the peace he turned to the townsmen and told them to keep up the good work.

Two ferries crossed the river opposite the Green Dragon in Water Street. One was a heavily built craft that could carry horses and cattle across to Stourbridge Common, alongside it a light passenger ferry. In 1909 it charged ½d. for children, 1d. for adults, 4d. for a cart with two wheels and 6d. for a trolley with four wheels. When the river was lowered in October 1920 to allow repairs at Baitsbite lock the two had been placed across the river with planks crossing the gap between them but this was only a temporary expedient. By 1925 it was in a poor condition: "Coun Porter said councillors might not realise what an old crock the ferry over the Cam at Chesterton was. When one went over in rough weather the water had to be bailed out and the sides of the ferry shook. At the time of the fair the ferryman would not risk taking over a crowd of people because it was so dangerous. Children were taking a very great risk in using the ferry and the council taking the greatest risk of all in not taking steps to prevent somebody being drowned. The ferry was obsolete, it should be condemned at once and done away with", the News reported that September. For the next ten years the Council debated until a new bridge finally opened in 1936. The smaller ferry was repositioned near Banham's boatyard and was used by the engineers constructing Elizabeth Bridge

There was another ferry near the Pike and Eel – now called the Penny Ferry

Two Tees Boatyard

At Chesterton the towpath changes sides at a spot called Morley's Holt

Stourbridge Common

The open common was for centuries home to one of the greatest trading fairs in Europe. In the 1700s traders made their way from Venice and Genoa with silks and velvets, Flemish weavers with their linen, Spaniards with their iron, Norwegians with tar and pitch, wines from France, Spain and – sometimes – Greece. All arrived in early September at King's Lynn and journeyed down the Ouse and Cam, whilst from all over England tradesmen with their packhorses and wagons were negotiating the atrocious roads. From Halifax, Leeds and Rochdale came cloth, Birmingham sent iron and brass, Sheffield cutlery, Nottingham and Leicester glass and stockings, Lancashire wool, hops from Surrey and Kent. The fair was laid out in lines with specific commodities in particular areas – a coal fair by the river, leather near the fish hill, a brush row, a cheese row and a cheap side. The main line leading from Newmarket Road to the river was called Garlic Row. There were beer-vendors, food-suppliers and everything necessary to cater for the thousands of people who descended on Cambridge from all around the country. Such was the crush that even London wherrymen brought their boats overland to Cambridge to take people down to the fair. But over the years the trading element of the fair declined leaving just amusements. By 1930 there was only one traction engine and swing boats, by 1931 even they were absent and in 1933 the Mayor was virtually alone when he declared the ghost of the fair open.

There may be other ghosts too: in 1802 people packed into a wooden theatre build as part of the fair when somebody yelled 'Fire' and somebody else turned out the lights. People panicked, some jumped down from the gallery, others tried to scramble over the spiked fence that separated them from the stage, more were trampled in the rush to escape. Several lost their lives and numerous injured were taken to nearby houses where they sat huddled in blankets awaiting treatment. Suspicion rested on some London pickpockets who took advantage of the confusion to steal purses and other belongings.

Railway bridge

The importance of the River Cam as a commercial route declined after the railway came to Cambridge in 1845. It was carried across the river and onwards to Ely by a trestle bridge whose arches were an obstacle to river users. It was superseded by a low girder bridge in 1870 until April 1930 when crowds descended to witness its replacement by a much larger and stronger bridge. The operation was a spectacular one, commencing at midnight engineers worked in the light of white acetylene flames to cut the steelwork in the centre of the old bridge and remove the track at either end. It was then raised on hydraulic jacks before being removed. Then the new bridge, which had already been erected alongside, was carefully moved into place, the lines reconnected and all was ready for trains to run again.

In the 1930s planners were considering a new ring-road around Cambridge linking Milton and Newmarket Roads which would have crossed the river by a new bridge in this area. The approach ramps were constructed before they changed their minds. But such proposals never go away and other crossings continue to be debated.

Pill Box

Fen Ditton

Fen Ditton church has seen many services since its construction in the 13th-century. But none can have been so bizarre as that of 6th May 1849. Edward Smith, the local fiddler, gardener and sexton had made some libellous remarks about the Rector's wife; she took him to the Ecclesiastical Court who ordered him to apologise in church. Thousands of people made their way to the village to witness this unique event; the pews were packed, people clung to the pillars and even sat on the altar table. Those who could not get in through the doors climbed on to the roof and smashed their way in through the windows. When the service started the rector was constantly interrupted and it was felt better to dispense with the hymns altogether. The arrival of the penitent was greeted with cheers and cat-calls; as he tried to make himself heard hassocks were thrown, the pews smashed and people seized the bell-ropes causing such a violent jangling that it completely drowned the rest of the din. He was then carried out on the shoulders of his friends to the Plough Inn where celebrations continued for the rest of the afternoon.

FEN DITTON Hall. c.1635 possibly built for Thomas Willys incorporating the main range of an early C15 building with upper hall. Barn late C15 or early C16. may have been a merchants' trading hall and warehouse and was originally unheated.

Another barn achieved notoriety in 1930 after it was converted into a dance hall. A policeman told how he looked through the window and observed people inside. Some of the women attending were known to be of an undesirable character and the men mostly members of the University. The girls were dancing by themselves down the centre of the room holding up their dresses; another girl got on top of the piano and danced. Later the University Proctor told how he went to the dance room which was in darkness and by the light of his lamp could see four undergraduates and seven girls. They said they were telling ghost stories.

FEN DITTON GREEN END (West Side) 18/6 No. 7 (Riverside Cottage) II Cottage. Early C14 with C16, C18 and c.1920 additions and alterations. Timber-framed and plastered, painted brick. Long straw thatch and plain tile roofs. Local brick ridge stack. One storey and attic. Aisled hall of two bays has further two bays to east and demolished bay or cross-wing to south; the arcade plates and unjowled posts survive with evidence of passing braces and one truncated brace in north-west post. Late C16 inserted floors and stack. Single storey extension to west, late C18 or early C19, replaces one bay or cross-wing to the aisled hall. (The brace to north-west post suggests a continuation of the arcade as an internal wall to an enclosed part of the aisle or cross-wing). North elevation; tall gabled facade dormer window with horizontal sliding sashes, two ground floor casement windows and boarded door. Interior details include two inglenook hearths with chamfered mantel beams, and cased and exposed main timbers of aisled hall. Chamfered floor joists to hall.

Plough

The grounds of the Plough are a favourite spot from which to witness the Bumps. The Bumping Races attracted large crowds who walked, cycled or boated down to Fen Ditton to get the best view of the action. It was a major social rather than just sporting event and artists and photographers recorded the fashions. Once racing was done the river was jammed with craft of all types making their way back to Cambridge; excursion boats, rowing boats, canoes each full of excited people.

Poplar Hall Farm which dates from the 1600s. Timber-framed with rendered margins to rough cast panels. Plain tile roof with some C17 crested ridge tiles. Two large red brick ridge stacks with round headed recessed panels. Two storeys and attics. Hall and cross-wing plan with central facade gable. C17 moulded barge boards. Three, three-light attic casement windows. Three, larger first floor casement windows. One ground floor three-light hung sash window to left hand of C18 six-panelled door with moulded wooden architrave and bracketed hood with soffit panels. Two casement windows to right hand. Interior stop-chamfered ceiling beams, C17 closed string oak staircase with splat balusters, and C17 plank doors. R.C.H.M.: East Cambs p. 59, mon. 6.

Motorway Bridge

Motorway Bridge – constructed 1975-76 to carry by-pass; has become a place for crews to paint graffiti on

Biggin Abbey

On the left is Biggin Abbey; this was built as a residence for the Bishop of Ely in the 1200s and was used to entertain royalty including King Henry III, Edward I and II. The present building dates back to the 1300s. A small attic room known as the 'Monks Prison' may have been used as a chapel and was described by Wm Cole.

Baitbite Lock

Baitsbite Lock is a forerunner of the increasingly large structures needed to ensure that boats can continue to reach Cambridge. Before the drainage of the fens in the 1600s the River Cam was tidal but after the construction of Denver Sluice the depth of water in the rivers decreased; they could no longer carry the weight of cargo as previously. So they needed more barges, adding to the costs.

By 1700 things were so bad that Cambridge, University and County combined to establish a body called the Conservators of the River Cam who were charged with maintaining the navigation from Clayhithe to Cambridge. They constructed four locks of which two survive, the one at Jesus Green and the other at Baitsbite. This was rebuilt in 1832 and tolls were charged for the boats that passed through. These were finally abolished when the local was automated in 1989 and the cottages that previously were home to the lock-keepers are now let out. Beyond Baitsbite the Cam continues on its journey towards Horningsey, Clayhithe, Upware and Ely

Bumping Races

Racing side by side was not possible on the narrow River Cam so boats chased each other and attempted to "bump" the one in front.

The first race was rowed in 1827. Iron rings or bungs - are set out at regular intervals of 150 feet along the bank and to which the boats are attached. A starting cannon is fired four minutes before the start, another one minute before - when the boats are to be ready in the stream with the cox holding the bung. The third bang starts the race. After a bump is made the boats pull to the bank out of the way of following crews - allowing the one immediately behind to set off after the one originally three ahead. They swap position for the next race. If boats get to the finishing point without catching or being caught they have 'rowed over' and keep position for the next race

There are 11 races in Lent term and another seven in May, each raced over four days

The last boat in each division starts from just above this lock

Little Bridge - on outside of first bend (Chesterton Bank) - carries the tow path over a culvert draining the fields; traditionally used as the start of a 'grind' - a long set piece training row

Motorway Bridge - constructed 1975-76 to carry by-pass; has become a place for crews to paint graffiti on

First Post reach - stretch of water between Little Bridge and First Post Corner - first 11-12 starting positions in this reach

Gun Shed - 20 yards above Road Bridge - next to place where guns traditionally fired; now guns often moved under the bridge which keeps them dry

The Ditch - small ditch leading into the Ditton Bank just before First Post Corner

First Post Corner - immediately above the starting position for first boats in each division. Originally the first starting post was here - it was moved back when the length of the course was shortened by the building of the first railway bridge - too narrow to allow boats to row through. This was site of fatal accident in 1888 when Clare were rammed by Trinity Hall 3 and the bows impaled an oarsman through the heart

The Gut - the narrowest part of the river above First Post Corner - two boats barely able to pass each other and this the scene of some of the worst pile-ups

Conservatory - owners often hand out drinks to any crews successfully bumping at this point

Grassy Corner - more difficult to get round and has hazard of barges and house boats moored round the inside. In most years at least one crew hits one, or the Chesterton bank. One of the best areas for spectators - many bumps here

Plough Reach – stretch between Grassy Corner and Ditton Corner

Pitt Club lawn – was part of a meadow hired by the Pitt Club and run as enclosure; more recently the club has held an enclosure by The Railings and taken to throwing strawberries at the crew

Plough – pub

Red Grind ferry – scene of drowning; But in 1905 came tragedy. At the end of the races those people who had watched from the grounds of the Plough Inn boarded the Red Grind ferry to the opposite bank and the towpath that would lead them back to Cambridge. Two journeys were completed safely but as the chain ferry made its third, packed with some twenty people, two undergraduates leapt on at the last moment. The ferry gave a lurch and turned turtle, pitching the screaming passengers into six feet of water. Onlookers were quick to appreciate the danger, some plunged into the river to help rescue those floundering, others flung chairs which they hoped would act as rafts and all but three women were saved. One was to have been married within a day or so, her fiancé watched her corpse carried lifeless from the water. Crowds packed Mill Road to see her body taken for burial to the church in which she was to have been married.

Morley's Cottage – one of the thatched cottages, belonged to a Mr Morley which had prolific garden with beans and cabbages. He gave his name to Morley's Holt where horses were transferred across the river because the towpath changes side at Chesterton

Ditton corner – above the Plough, fields called Ditton Paddocks

Black Cottage – used as landmark, opposite The Stump

The Stump – stump of a large tree on Ditton Bank beside ditch

The Railings – half-way up Long reach – remnants of an iron fence which went round the field

Long Reach extends from Ditton Corner to the Railway Bridge – the longest straight section of the river - along it are the Pink and White and Black Houses

Pink & White Houses just before railway bridge

Railway Bridge – the original wooden bridge was too narrow to allow boat to row through so start of the races moved; when bridge replaced the original finish could be reused

Roy Meldrum Memorial Shelter – Latin inscription - coach of the Lady Margaret and Boat Race Crews, opened in Feb 1957 used by Senior Umpire to brief juniors before a race; gives shelter for coaches from snow and rain A new shelter has appeared on the towpath near the Pike and Eel.

Peter's Posts – line concrete posts to prevent motorists getting onto towpath

Pike and Eel – now Penny Ferry

Stourbridge Common

Top Finish for men's race is marked by concrete post embedded into Common

Chesterton Footbridge – replaced the horse ferry

Jesus college boathouse built in 1883 but destroyed by fire in 1932, the weathervane and clock tower were transferred to the new building opened in 1933; clock tower has numbers in the bottom half of the face upside down

Goldie Boathouse – oldest remaining – built 1882 and named after J.H.D. Goldie who stroked the University crew four times. Interior refurbished in 1995 and no longer used as a boathouse

The original First Trinity Boathouse was the first privately-owned boathouse on the river in 1896; new building opened 1935 is structurally almost identical

Sidney Street by Mike Petty

Central Cambridge seems always to be being knocked down and rebuilt; we lament the loss of the 'Old Petty Cury' and its replacement with the Lion Yard shops, now St Andrew's Street is the scene of more change as work continues on the 'Grand Arcade'.

But at least Sidney Street is as we remember it. Or is it?

In the 1860s Arthur Nicholls stood his camera in the street to record a view that seems to have changed little over the centuries. But that of course is an illusion; behind the frontages there has been massive change hidden from the street; with a new Sainsbury's supermarket and a modern accommodation block for Trinity College students. These have replaced Wray's Court, an enclosed yard containing old houses with no back doors, no water, no light except gas, a basement full of cobwebs like upside down umbrellas and just two toilets for all the residents. It is remembered by some as a frightening, dark, dingy, eerie place inhabited by witches but for others it provided a welcome home in the heart of Cambridge during the immediate post-war days. [SCAN 102.45 – ARTHUR NICHOLLS' PHOTO OF SIDNEY STREET C1860 – FIND MODERN EQUIVALENT]

Across the road Sidney Sussex college still stands as it has for centuries since it took over the site of a friary swept away by the Reformation. Like other colleges it is protected behind its high walls; but these walls were breached in the 1830s, not by rioters but by the roots of a row of poplar trees which caused the wall to lean out to such an extent that people were afraid to walk past. The trees were cut down when the present entrance was constructed about 1835. [SCAN 2009 SIDNEY SUSSEX COLLEGE SHOWING THE TREES]

Holy Trinity Church on the corner of Market Street dates back to the 12th-century but owes much of its present appearance to works commissioned by Charles Simeon who was appointed vicar in 1782. At first he was unwelcome to the parishioners who stayed away and locked the doors of their pews, so that anybody who did come had to stand in the aisles. But Simeon was not to be beaten; he started a Sunday evening lecture and attracted a good congregation but the churchwardens locked the church doors and carried off the keys leaving everybody standing out in the street. So he hired a room and carried on his preaching there.

He was a great evangelist and people came round to him. Soon the church was so packed that he built a gallery to hold them and then pulled down the old chancel and replaced it with this new extension built of brick and plaster which he designed himself. [SCAN 7124 HOLY TRINITY CHURCH AND MARKET STREET 1814]

But there was another problem facing the church in the 1830s. Its churchyard was a valuable open space in the cramped town centre and women hung their washing out there, the sheets flapping over the gravestones. Veterinary surgeons conducted examinations right outside the church forcing the Minister to suspend funeral services since his words were drowned by the noise of the animals. Owners of houses which opened on to the back of the churchyard claimed a right of way through to the road, one man built a shed to garage his chaise whilst other people rode their horses through the graveyard, damaging the footpath. The Churchwardens stopped up the cartway leaving just a footpath on the south side – now used by shoppers crossing from one Marks and Spencer store to the other

A major change in Sidney Street came with the building of Foster's Bank at the junction with Hobson Street in 1894. It was founded by Ebenezer Foster, a miller who started his banking by simply issuing receipts to farmers who would exchange them amongst themselves instead of cash, trusting the Foster name as a guarantee that the bill would be honoured. The bank began trading in Bridge Street but in 1836 moved to the Turks Head Coffee House in Trinity Street where security was provided by three junior staff who were obliged to sleep in the bank, one in front of the strong room with his sword by his side. The bank prospered and the business passed down to his sons. By 1890 the premises were too small and the decision was taken to move. The London architect Waterhouse was employed to design the new buildings and authorised to spare no expense. The construction was undertaken by William Sindall. It was to have a clock tower 100 feet high that would dominate the town centre from its position opposite the entrance to Petty Cury. In November 1893 the new bank opened with a flourish and although in 1903 it amalgamated with Capital and Counties Bank and in 1919 was absorbed into Lloyds the Foster name is still carved into the stonework. In 1935 a considerable extension was built on the corner site. [SCAN 86.207 FOSTER'S BANK EXTENSION BEING CONSTRUCTED; SCAN 86.204 DEMOLITION IN PROGRESS IN SIDNEY STREET 1934]

Next to the bank in 1898 was the organ-builders and musical warehouse of Miller and Son, beside them the Cambridge Steam Power Soda Water Works, Blott's milliners and draper's shop and the coachbuilders premises of Messrs Hunnybun. This block of property came under the auctioneer's hammer in January 1903 in a major sale. There was a large attendance and the bidding was spirited; Blott's shop was sold for £3,600 but Hunnybun's carriage showroom and harness-maker's shop were withdrawn only to be sold later at a considerably enhanced price.

Cambridge was then a town whose shops existed to serve the University and many closed down when the students left for their long holidays. But by the 1920s the introduction of motor bus services had greatly enhanced its role as a county shopping centre. The council was keen to widen the streets and provide easier access for traffic. They introduced policies to encourage people to demolish old buildings and erect replacements further back to provide a 'thoroughfare of handsome dimension from what was once a narrow cobbled lane in which carts could be left unattended by horse or man'.

In 1929 Messrs Boots the Chemist announced the time was ripe for a major redevelopment to create 'an emporium to provide an attractive shopping centre for patrons of all classes'. The external appearance would harmonise with Cambridge's noble architectural traditions and raise the standard of commercial architecture, they promised. Amongst the premises demolished for the fine new shop was Caxton Court and a range of quaint old buildings, now

long forgotten. [SCAN 1523 – 1880 VIEW SHOWING THE OLD BUILDINGS DEMOLISHED FOR BOOTS AND THE FOSTERS BANK]

Similar change was taking place across the street: “There never was a time surely when there were so many works of destruction going on as at present. Little bits of old Cambridge are going one by one and elaborate new buildings are rising up in their place. No wonder that those who come back to the town after a few years’ absence express amazement at the changes they see. When we think of the great business changes effected in the heart of the town we may well gasp”, the Cambridge Daily News commented in March 1930

The east side of Sidney Street was knocked down and rebuilt. A number of old-established enterprises such as Thompson’s gentleman’s outfitters, Eaden Spearing and Raynes solicitors, the Leeds and Leicester Boot Company and the Lord Nelson, True Blue inn disappeared. In their place came major new stores for Sainsbury’s and Woolworths to be joined by Marks and Spencer and Heffer’s stationary shop and art gallery. [SCAN 10268 – VIEW FROM HOLY TRINITY CHURCH 1905 SHOWING BUILDINGS ON EAST SIDE; SCAN 8899 THE REPLACEMENT BUILDINGS C1944] [SCAN 10235 YARD OF THE TRUE BLUE INN c1930]

But it was not just shops: a new Dorothy Café-restaurant and dancehall was launched which was to remain the entertainment centre of Cambridge for over 30 years. It included the Oak room on the ground floor where luncheons were served, the Venetian room for coffee and teas and a ballroom with one of the finest Maple sprung floors in East Anglia. It had a resident band and became very popular for its tea dances. Upstairs were small rooms for private parties and weddings and many local organisations held their annual dinners and balls at ‘The Dot’. [SCAN 5518 ADVERTISEMENT FOR THE DOROTHY 1965]

Changes continued into the 1950s; Coad’s haberdashery was absorbed into Woolworths and with planners still seeking to widen the street Boot’s frontage was set back. Millers Music transformed their shop with a new window giving a glimpse down into the basement before moving to Sussex Street. Here reconstruction had seen first one and then the other side demolished and rebuilt for an imposing block of shops and offices connected to Hobson Street by an artistically-designed crescent and colonnade of twelve shops. [SCAN 7473 COAD’S SHOP 1950]

Whilst much of the physical rebuilding was now completed the actual traders have changed tremendously since Erica Dimock surveyed Sidney Street in 1963 for her ‘Down Your Street’ column in the Cambridge Daily News. Amongst those who have been consigned to history are Bodgers bespoke tailors, Thrussell’s who specialised in high-class ready-made shoes and Gallyon’s the gunsmith which closed in 1982 after 198 years. More recently has come the closure of Joshua Taylor whose store on the corner with Market Street had been a Cambridge institution since 1860. [SCAN 100.78 JOSHUA TAYLOR’S SHOP CORNER MARKET STREET 1930S]

Yet new shops open and with pedestrianisation finally replacing the bustle of buses and cars Sidney Street remains one of the city’s principal trading areas. [SCAN 7925 SHOPPERS OUTSIDE THE OLD SAINSBURY’S, 1961 SCAN 6880 SIDNEY STREET LOOKING TO PETTY CURY 1964]

River Cam Baits Bite to the Old West, by Mike Petty

Once beyond Baits Bite lock the Cam continues its journey towards Ely. On the left is Milton, an ancient village now greatly expanded with new houses but containing some architectural gems including the building once home to William Cole, a famous antiquarian who travelled extensively, filling notebooks with details of what he saw. [SCAN 9526 – PICTURESQUE MILTON c1905]

In October 1779 he visited Horningsea church which he found: “a very large building and in a deplorable nasty and shattered condition and except the parish lays out an 100 or 2 pounds in repairing it, will soon fall down” Fortunately the building still survives. Horningsea was the site of a major Roman pottery industry evidence of which is still regularly unearthed by rabbits who tunnel into the soil of the churchyard. [SCAN 9523 – HORNINGSEA FROM THE RIVER c1905]

River trade became important during the Middle Ages with wharves along the banks being linked by Dock Lane to the village high street. Men and women made a living by peeling willows to make baskets and eel-traps but life was not always peaceable. In July 1819 the women who worked for Mr Wheeler had ‘their annual frolic’ and soon not one lady of the party was sober. They began to fight amongst themselves, pulling off caps, and pulling hair until a pitched battle ensued. Samuel Beales’ wife was one of those involved in the melee and he decided it was time for her to come home, but Alice Green set about him for breaking up the fun. He did not retaliate, but his wife did, taking advantage of her husband’s intervention to black her adversary’s eye. [SCAN DOCK LANE – COTTAGE IN DOCK LANE]

The opening of a major industry in the form of coprolite works transformed the community and brought dozens of additional workers in each morning. Many came from Waterbeach, which meant they had to cross the Cam. Tragedy struck in March 1872; the small ferry boat was packed with eight men when another man jumped on board causing it to capsize, throwing everybody into the water. James Beasley, who worked for the Conservators of the River Cam launched his boat to rescue them. He pulled out two, but one of them had been in the water for ten minutes by then. He took the man to the stable where the doctor rubbed his chest with salt and brandy, but to no avail and the 38-year-old worker was pronounced dead.

This added to pressure for a proper bridge. There had been various incidents when threshing machines or loaded farm carts got stuck while being ferried across. An Act of Parliament was obtained for a new bridge which opened at Clayhithe in September 1875, charging a toll on all who crossed. The tolls continued until 1938 when the County Council bought the bridge, erecting a new one the following year.

The Clayhithe Bridge Company also invested in the adjoining public house which had been known for 100 years as the Pike and Eel. It was renamed ‘The House of Lords’ and then became the ‘Bridge Inn’. They improved the grounds making it one of the prettiest places in the county. A new dancing saloon was created and the field alongside made suitable for enjoyment. By 1876 Alfred Mason was choosing it as a suitable venue to give his 50 labourers a celebration feast on the occasion of his marriage. By 1912 it sported a small zoo though this ended in 1916 when the bear was roasted on a spit and sold in sandwiches in aid of soldiers’ comforts. It became a free house in 1918 since when it has enjoyed mixed fortune until now it is again a most popular riverside rendezvous. [SCAN 86.313 – THE BRIDGE HOTEL CLAYHITHE c1920]

The house across the river was erected by the Conservators of the River Cam in 1842 and included a large room inn which they held banquets. They built a sluice together with a toll-keepers house and stables for six horses. In 1922 their responsibility was formally extended to Bottisham Lock. [SCAN 105.35 – CONSERVATOR’S HOUSE 1890S]

Nearby a small tributary ran into Waterbeach down which barges were towed to the Star Inn where the horses were stabled and men slept in the hayloft before continuing their journey. It declined with the arrival of the railway in August 1845; the first train from London was pulled by the engine ‘Wildfire’ and carried 200 gentleman and the band of the Coldstream Guards who rode in a third-class carriage.

The famous preacher, Charles Haddon Spurgeon was appointed minister of Waterbeach Baptist Chapel in 1851, when only 17 years old. He had been baptised in the River Lark at Isleham and soon others were flocking to be baptised in the Cam. In September 1886, Mr G. Williams, baptised five women and one youth in the river near Bottisham sluice. “The greatest decorum was manifested on the occasion, and many hundreds on the river banks were witnesses”, the Cambridge Chronicle reported. Such events became common. [SCAN 10278 BAPTISM IN THE CAM AT WATERBEACH]

Sadly not everybody who entered the water came out alive. In July 1860 a 70-year-old Outwell lighterman, Henry Jefferson brought his boats up the Cam with a load of deals and slate. While opening the lock gates at Bottisham Henry staggered and collapsed. By chance Mr Patterson, a surgeon from Waterbeach, was close by but the man never recovered.

The locks were born at a period of unrest in the 1650s. By then the civil war between Cavaliers and Roundheads was over and by then too the major drainage works such as the New Bedford River and Denver Sluice were completed. But the drainers were still at work on the fens around Swaffham Bulbeck, Reach, Burwell and Wicken. The rivers that link these villages with the Cam are called lodes and were probably constructed or improved by the Romans. But residents resisted the new improvements. The sluice at Bottisham was damaged and other works thrown down by protestors. Things got so desperate that mounted troops galloped into the area to disperse mutinous persons and soldiers sent to stand guard at night. But they were overpowered by an armed mob and made to help destroy the new banks. The works were finally completed, but at great cost. [SCAN 100.07 BOTTISHAM LOCK 1879]

Barges plied along the lodes carrying fenland reeds and rushes or stone from pits at Reach and Burwell and bringing in a variety of goods to offload at warehouses in the Commercial End of Swaffham Bulbeck. [SCAN 8737 – A BARGE ON BURWELL LODE]

Small chapels were built to serve the isolated communities in these lonely fens. One was demolished after the floor gave way during a service but another survives and is still used once a year for a harvest festival. They drew their congregation from homes on both sides of the river, some of whom crossed on ferries or a floating bridge that also conveyed tradesmen’s horses and carts. [SCAN 86.1461 THE SWAFFHAM FEN CHAPEL]

The ferries were operated by the landlords of riverside pubs such as the Green Man, Jolly Waterman and the most famous of all the Five Miles from Anywhere, No Hurry, at Upware. [SCAN 9644 THE JOLLY WATERMAN 1879]

Upware has gone down in the folklore as the home of a Republic and a King. The Republic was established by undergraduates at the No Hurry in the 1850s to which they rowed for an escape from the rigours of University learning in shooting, fishing and drinking. The landlord John Appleby and his wife built up a reputation for their meals of eels – fried, stewed, boiled or poached – followed by roast beef and Yorkshire pudding, duck, green peas and potatoes followed down with currant and raspberry tart. They were also famed for their egg-flip.

[SCAN 105.36 – THE FERRY ACROSS TO THE NO HURRY]

But this was not the only pub; alongside the lode stood the Anchor Inn, much frequented by bargees. The proprietor at one time was Mark Parr whose forceful adjectives and his tendency to enjoy the ale that he sold testified to his own fenland background. His second wife was very thrifty which she proved by wearing the voluminous garments that had belonged to his first who had died some fifteen years previously.

Into this potent environment arrived Richard Ramsay Fielder, an MA of Jesus College who proclaimed himself ‘King of Upware’ and fought anybody who disputed that title. He lodged at the No Hurry, a great muscular fellow in a red waistcoat and corduroy breeches who carried with him a brown jug containing six gallons of punch which he would share with the friends who flocked to his rural retreat. [SCAN 103.29 – THE ANCHOR, UPWARE]

King and Republic, the Anchor and the old No Hurry have all now gone, though a modern riverside pub continues the old name and boatmen still stop for refreshment. But Upware remains a unique place where you stand on the ground and look up to boats floating on the water of the Lode high above you. A short stroll along the bank brings you to a wooden ‘Cock-up’ bridge, its steep approach containing slats to enable the horses to grip as they towed the barges up to Burwell. To the left is Wicken Fen, a haven for butterflies, bugs and beetles which naturalists plan to extend south towards Quy and Cambridge, surrendering back to nature the rich black fertile soil that was brought into cultivation during the ‘Dig for Victory’ campaigns of the Second World War. It was then that the concrete roads that run straight as arrows were constructed through to Reach and Swaffham Prior, past houses that are themselves subsiding back into the soil on which they were built.

In the meantime the water from the fen needs to be gathered up into great ditches and pumped up into the Cam. Upware has been home to windpumps, steam engines, diesel and now electric pumps. The remains of some of the buildings which housed the engines still stand, testimony to the constant work needed to keep the land free from flood. But such technology can fail, as in February 1897 when the steam engine broke down; it took five weeks to repair by which time the area was under water. In 1937 the battle to fight the floods returned.
[SCAN 5631 STEAM PUMPING STATION UPWARE c1890]

The story of the landscape is explained to children at the Upware Field Study Centre, housed in the old village school. From here one can follow a footpath to the Commissioners’ Pit, a deep tree-filled hole from which clay was extracted to maintain the river bank and in which you can see remains of a coral reef, demonstrating just how great the climate change has been over the centuries.

This stretch of the river has been a favourite spot as a correspondent to the Cambridge Daily News recalled in August 1898: “Two miles from the Five Miles from Anywhere there is a place called “Dimock’s Cote” to which spot one of Messrs Bolton Bros. large furniture vans proceeded on Saturday last. Arriving without accidents a very busy time was experienced in rigging up accommodation for living and stores. It is very advisable for anyone intending to camp by the river side to take a large filter, and even then to drink as little water as possible. Fishing was very poor. The bullocks which are grazed on the washes were attracted by the unusual lights and gave some little trouble, but owing to a good watch dog, due notice of their visits was early given, so we were always ready for the enemy”

Ahead the river is spanned by a great half-moon concrete bridge which carries the A1123 Stretham to Wicken road. It was a gravel track until 1914 when, fearing invasion, the army constructed a Military Road to allow transport of men and materials towards the East Coast. However there was a dispute over who should pay for the erection of the bridges over the Old

West and the Cam so they not built until 1928. The bridge was strengthened in 1994. [SCAN 196 – TRAFFIC POURS OVER THE BRIDGE AFTER ITS OPENING]

Beyond the bridge the river continues between the high banks towards another riverside pub, the Fish and Duck far from any village, which was described in 1852 as a newly-built house with seven rooms and stabling for 12 horses. A new road down to the pub was constructed in 1968 and it was extended and modernised in 1968 with a marina providing mooring for pleasure craft. [SCAN 89.200 – THE FISH AND DUCK IN JUNE 1965]

Ahead in the distance stands Ely Cathedral, tempting us onward. But to the left lies another stream, the Old West which is surely worth a diversion to explore.

The exploration continues in next month's Our Time

Our Time, September 2005
Trinity Street, by Mike Petty –

When I first started work in Cambridge in 1964 I knew even less of the city than I do today.

One bit I did get to explore was Trinity Street with its bookshops and the Turks Head. But when looking back to what Erica Dimock found when she compiled her 'Down Your Street' article in September that year there were many shops I never visited, many of which have now disappeared.

In those days you could drive down Trinity Street which had been made one-way in 1948. What's more you could park beside the road while you shopped or toured the colleges. Parking meters had recently been introduced, causing concern to some shopkeepers who feared it would have a detrimental effect on their trade. But others said it was only the locals who would be inconvenienced and they seldom shopped there anyway: the tourists and university people would continue to come.

The importance of the University clientele was reflected in the shops. There were numerous tailors including Arthur Shepherd whose premises had one been home to John Bowtell the bookbinder and antiquarian. [SCAN 1 – SHEPHERD'S TAILORS, 1930S] A.A. Roper had arrived in 1919 though their shop had been almost entirely reconstructed by Trinity College for their Angel Court built in 1957-8 whilst W & G Taylor men's outfitters had started in 1909.. They specialised in academic robes which still a requirement for undergraduates in those days. I remember being stopped one night by a Proctor who asked politely why I was not wearing a gown after dusk, only to gather from my fen accent that I was not University material. Taylor's were to close in 1989 after blaming a three-fold increase in rent. [SCAN 2 – LOOKING SOUTH FROM TRINITY COLLEGE, 1890s SHOWING SHOPS BEFORE DEVELOPMENT OF ANGEL COURT]

But change was an issue in 1964, especially the increasing numbers of banks. With the arrival of William Deacons', which had moved into premises formerly occupied by Pratt, Manning and Company bespoke tailors, there were now four, the others being Lloyds, the District and the National Provincial. Another, Lombard's, was to follow in 1968.

Across the street stands the fine timber-framed building that had once been home to Foster's Bank. In the 1960s it was occupied by the Berni Inn's Turks Head which had just been completely redesigned to provide a steak bar and a chicken, ham and fish restaurant together with stable and cellar bars. A visit here became a regular treat, usually for a schooner of sherry, apparently straight from the barrel, and a gammon steak with pineapple. [SCAN 4 – TURKS HEAD STABLE BAR 1963]

In the 1920s it had been Matthews Café home to ‘True Blue’ and ‘Beefsteak’ Clubs whose members were mostly titled undergraduates. In 1927 came alterations as reported in the Cambridge Daily News recorded: “The fascinating experience of lunching in Cambridge in the atmosphere of our Elizabethan forefathers is made possible by the opening of new rooms at Messrs Matthew’s Café in Trinity Street. They have acquired the two upper storeys of the building & turned rooms which were formerly part of a lodging house into a charming medieval retreat. The original beams and window frames remain as well as some beautiful old carvings and the rooms have been furnished in the style of the period, pains having been taken to secure faithful reproductions even down to lamps and pewter pots. [SCAN 3 – MATTHEW’S CAFÉ, LATER THE TURKS HEAD]

Another restaurant was The Whim on the corner of Green Street; it boasted a world-wide reputation due to the number of undergraduates who dined there and had recently expanded to cater for lunches and suppers on an upper floor. Its cakes and pastries were well known, as was its sometimes strangely-dressed customers; the owner, Miss E.H. Thornber telling Erica that some regulars had on occasions arrived for breakfast in their dressing gowns!

Undergraduates remain an important part of the street, but they are of a somewhat different breed to those once lodged at 20 Trinity Street, above the present Post Office.

Towards close of Edwardian era young gentlemen reclined in their rooms consuming larks on toast using silver cutlery brought with them at the beginning of term. Their accommodation consisted of a sitting room and bedroom, of which there were nine sets in the building that had been converted from two houses into one boarding establishment. Each had a laden coal scuttle each day and their baths were run at predetermined times. Nine suits of clothes, carefully cleaned & pressed the day before, were placed at ready, anything other than suits being seldom worn. Nine fires were lit & nine breakfasts served in their own room. A typical breakfast include fish, fruit or a mixed grill featuring devilled kidneys. In the kitchen a large wickerwork basket housed each man’s silver cutlery, a large wardrobe contained individual sets of linen brought up at beginning of term while the large cellar contained nine racks for each man’s stock of wine or the occasional maturing pheasant. Lunch was often served in the house though it was cooked in the college kitchen. Turtle soup, fish, snipe and saddle of lamb involved four separate journeys and an average of 18 to 20 such meals left the college kitchens each day. There were no portions: if man ordered chicken he got the whole bird to do with as he liked. When the meal was finished an enormous basket on wheels collected the dirty crockery & returned it to college. Tea was usually served just after four in the afternoon and at right time of year crumpet and muffins, still hot from Matthew’s bakery were consumed in front of blazing fire. [SCAN 5 – TRINITY UNDERGRADUATES DINED OF THE BEST THE COLLEGE COULD PROVIDE]

When I started to develop the City Library’s Cambridgeshire Collection I would make a habit of visiting Trinity Street bookshops looking for additional items, often visiting Deighton Bell who specialised in antiquarian volumes. Heffers were still in Petty Cury until 1970 and for more recent Cambridge books I visited Bowes and Bowes on the corner of St Mary’s Street who claimed to be the oldest bookshop in Britain, tracing their history back to 1571. It is now home to the Cambridge University Bookshop and during renovations much of the ancient fabric of the building that had previously been hidden was revealed. [SCAN 6 – BOWES AND BOWES BOOKSHOP ON THE CORNER OF TRINITY STREET SEEN ABOVE CROWDS OF UNDERGRADUATES AWAITING THE RESULT OF A VOTE TO ADMIT WOMEN TO THE UNIVERSITY, 1897]

Frank Reeve was the manager at Bowes, an enthusiastic local historian who I was privileged to assist as he compiled various books. His 'Victorian and Edwardian Cambridge from Old Photographs' was published by Batsford in 1971 and included my name amongst the acknowledgements alongside luminaries such as Enid Porter of the Folk Museum, Arthur Halcrow of Trinity College and County Archivist Michael Farrar. It was the first of the numerous volumes of pictures that have been published ever since and included the classic views by Arthur Nichols of All Saints Church opposite Trinity College which was demolished in 1865 [SCAN 7 – ALL SAINT'S CHURCH BEFORE 1865]

But my favourite book of Frank's is the one entitled just 'Cambridge' that came out five years later and summarised the history of the town and university from earliest times up to 1975. He built up an extensive private collection of local information building on indexes and scrapbooks started by his father. These surround me as I work today, indeed Erica's article is filed away in one of his albums.

The future of St Michael's Church was causing concern back in 1964; it had fallen into disrepair and was little used. Plans had been drawn up to convert it into a parish hall and youth club with a small adjoining chapel. Now it has been remodelled and incorporates the Michaelhouse café, recalling how in the 1320s it had been the home to a new college, Michaelhouse, later merged into Trinity College. For years afterwards Trinity used the south aisle as their college chapel, whilst Gonville Hall used the north. The church was badly damaged by fire in November 1849; five fire engines rushed to the scene and buckets passed hand-to-hand to the pump at Trinity College then down to the river for water. It took two hours hard work before the flames were checked. [SCAN 8 – FIRE AT ST MICHAEL'S CHURCH 1849]

Fire is an ever-present hazard in such historic streets. In February 1929 A serious blaze broke out at Caius College where two rooms in Tree Court were completely gutted. Policemen got a hydrant in the courtyard to work and the Fire Brigade was quickly on the scene but the inside of the building was almost a furnace. The fire was quickly got under control though not before considerable damage had been done. The firemen experienced bad conditions owing to the intense cold: the water froze on their clothing and icicles were left hanging from the ledges.

Nearby was the Blue Boar Hotel, once an important coaching inn. Frank Reeve's card index records it was the terminus for the 'Union' and 'Beehive' stagecoaches which were amongst the slowest on the London route, taking at least nine hours on the journey. The entrance to the inn yard was notoriously low and many a passenger who forgot to duck was knocked from the roof of the coach. The yard was covered in 1900 and became the hotel dining room. The hotel itself closed in 1986 and has become more student rooms. [SCAN 9 – LOUNGE OF BLUE BOAR c1900]

In 1964 the major grocery store of Matthews and Son's had just closed. It had been established in 1821 and sold china, glass, candles and oil lamps as well as quality provisions to customers who included Austen Chamberlain. Now they had found it impossible to operate profitably under the existing trading conditions and rather than lower their standards had decided to cease trading. [SCAN 10 MATTHEW'S ADVERTISEMENT CHRISTMAS 1922] [SCAN 11 INSIDE MATTHEW'S SHOP 1950s]

When their tenancy came to an end Trinity College demolished the premises, clearing a great swathe between Trinity Street, Green Street and Whewell's Court for a new Heffer's Bookshop and the Sainsbury Supermarket with its entrance in Sidney Street. They also inserted student accommodation and a theatre before recreating the frontages so skilfully that few people appreciate the transformation that has taken place within the last 40 years.

Trinity Street has so much of interest that it is amazing anybody has time to consider its two colleges, Gonville and Caius and Trinity itself. But their story is told in countless histories and guidebooks – including a number written by Frank Reeve.

The Old West, by Mike Petty – Our Time, September 2005

Mike Petty continues his exploration of some of the history of the River Cam

At Pope’s Corner, beside the Fish and Duck, the Cam is joined by a river called the Old West that runs East through open countryside along its entire length. Nowhere is there a village alongside the river and once the Fish and Duck has disappeared there is just one other hostelry along its route.

Two bridges cross in quick succession; the first carries walkers on the Fen Rivers Way long-distance footpath, the second is a railway bridge carrying travellers on the main line from Cambridge to Ely which opened in 1845. But then there is little to see but the banks on either side, coots, moorhens and the occasional swan.

Stretham Mere

The junction of the Cam and the Old West encloses a triangular shaped piece of low-lying ground. Here water accumulated which could not easily get away again forming a large shallow lake called Stretham Mere, which is shown on the earliest county maps of the 1500s. [SCAN 1 – THE OLD WEST FROM SAXTON’S MAP OF 1576]

William Daniels remembered it in 1807 as a vast tract of morass, covered with reeds which properly harvested and stacked would be worth three hundred pounds to the farmer. They were used as thatch on good houses as well as cottages, being much more durable than straw. But in the winter the reed beds were full of starlings whose weight broke the reeds down and caused a hundred pounds of damage in one night. Boys were employed to drive them away, the sound of gunshots regularly being heard.

Not all the shots were aimed at starlings: there were pochards, shovelers, teals, garganics, lapwings and other wildfowl. They provided a living for wildfowlers like William Merry who went out in his punt. Laying flat in the bottom with his legs stretched out behind on each side to steady it and a small stalking stick in each hand he’d propel himself out to where the duck were. He could get nearly up to them before they realised. Then he’d cock his punt gun, wait for the duck to rise and fire. The force of the explosion would push the punt back several yards. Then it would just be a case of collecting the dead duck. Quite how many he’d bring down with one shot it would be hard to say – you always had to take what he claimed with a bit of salt

There was no doubt that as a marksman he was extraordinarily expert. His gun with its six feet long barrel was so heavy that only a powerful man could raise it. With it Merry could kill a snipe flying.

But he made more money by taking gentlemen out with him. Frequently while shooting parties with other guides were being towed in their punts all over the area, Old Merry was steering his punt silently to the scene of the action. In thick fogs or even in the dark he knew how to proceed in the morning and return at night. His eye and ear were keen at the approach of wildfowl in flight, and his caution to look out at the coming of the birds was so exact that no person could ever complain of want of shots if they obeyed his direction. "His knowledge in seeing the wildfowl fly and knowing to what particular spot they would direct their course was accurate, and his punt was certain to be either in a direction to intercept them in flight, or to be concealed among the reeds close to where they assemble to feed at eve or morning", Daniels reported. [SCAN 2 – FENLAND WILDFOWLING not Stretham)]

Today Stretham Mere is just a memory though some of the area is still covered by water. For a large reservoir has been dug by the farmer to collect rain during winter months that he can use to irrigate his crops during the growing season. There are now more acres covered with deeper water than ever before attracting wildfowl and sportsmen just as it did in the past.

But still the constant struggle continues to ensure the land can be kept dry.

Stretham Old Engine

Until the great drainage schemes of the 1630s and 1640s the Old West was a major river carrying the Great Ouse from Huntingdon and St Ives towards Ely and the sea. Even today at times of exceptional rain the stream will overflow its central channel and spread until water stretches to the high banks on either side. [SCAN 22 – HIGH WATER IN THE OLD WEST AT STRETHAM, FEB 2001

However the rain that falls on the fields is trapped on the wrong side of the banks and cannot get away. It needs to be pumped up into the river.

In 1741 landowners obtained an Act of Parliament to drain the Waterbeach Level, to the south of the Old West. They erected windpumps working scoopwheels to push the water up into the river. But these would only work when the wind blew and as the land dried out could not raise the water high enough. So in 1831 they erected a steam pumping engine, a heavy structure calling for very firm foundations driven down on a bed of hard gravel 10 feet below the peat surface. [SCAN 12 – A PAINTING OF A DRAINAGE MILL BY J.M. HEATHCOTE]

The steam was generated in boilers that ran on coal transported by barge. They required regular maintenance: twice a year a man had to go inside the gloomy, cramped and dripping space working by the light of a foul-smelling tallow candle to chip away the scale. Consumption varied but was always around 5 tons for 24 hours running with 10-12 cwt to get up steam.

It powered a beam engine that turned a giant scoop wheel raising water four feet from the land drains to the level of the rivers. But as drainage continued and the fen shrank further the scoop wheel had to be replaced. It proved a very wet autumn and while the engine was out of action water rose steadily in the drains as engineers worked long into the night. By 1892 parts of the machinery had become seriously worn and needed replacement. During the flood of 1919 it operated for 40 days and nights but the boilers were almost worn out and a diesel engine was installed, retaining the beam engine just for emergencies. During the 1937 floods the diesel worked for 1,853 hours and ten years later ran continuously from 14th to 19th March.

By then however continued peat shrinkage meant water no longer flowed freely towards the pump standing high on its gravel base. A completely new pumping station was installed to pump water into the Cam and the complex of engines at Stretham have become museum pieces attracting visitors from around the world. [SCAN 3 – THE GIANT STRETHAM ENGINE] [SCAN 23 VIEW TO STRETHAM ENGINE]

Military and Wooden Bridges

Today the work of the old wind drainage miles is done by small electric pumps like the one housed in a brick building alongside the bridge that carries the ‘Military Road’ towards Wicken. The road was built by the army in 1914 during fears of a German invasion on the east coast but nobody could decide who should pay for the bridge which was not constructed until 1928, replacing a ferry. Beyond the engine a wooden bridge erected by George Gould, Lord of the Manor near the site of a ford was by 1976 so rotten that it was closed to motor vehicles for two years. It was repaired and then rebuilt completely. [SCAN 4 – OLD FERRY ON THE ‘MILITARY ROAD’] [SCAN 5 –A RIVER BOARD TUG TOWING BARGES UNDER THE BRIDGE ACROSS THE OLD WEST] [SCAN 6 – THE OLD ‘WOODEN BRIDGE’ FROM STRETHAM ENGINE]

Stretham Ferry

Beyond lies Stretham Ferry Bridge. Although the A10 to Cambridge follows the line of the Roman Akeman Street there was no hard road from Stretham to Chittering and Waterbeach until in the 1750s. A turnpike act was obtained in 1763 and the road completed some 20 years later at cost of upwards of £7,000.

The first bridge erected was too steep: farmers had to put an additional horse on to their cart to drag loads over it. It was also too narrow for motor traffic so in 1925 a new concrete bridge was erected and tested by four traction engines being driven over it. The remains of the old bridge can still be seen alongside the replacement, itself now superseded by a realigned main road. [SCAN 7 – THE ORIGINAL FERRY BRIDGE] [SCAN 8 – THE 1925 REPLACEMENT FROM THE SAME ANGLE] [SCAN 9 – TRACTION ENGINES TESTING THE STRENGTH OF THE BRIDGE 1925]

The ‘Lazy Otter’ pub with its riverside tables is a 1987 successor to the ‘Royal Oak’. In 1797 the pub, then known as ‘The Charles in the Oak’ was described as “old & well established”. It was destroyed by fire in 1844; suspicion rested on a travelling salesman of lucifer matches who had been turned away by the landlord. By 1906 the replacement contained two bedrooms for lodgers or travellers with stabling for 6 horses & 3 vehicles.

Cottages opposite were demolished after being damaged by a bus in December 1962. They stood alongside a brickworks, now a boat repair yard and a series of fishing lakes as the river winds its way between the old and new A10 crossings. [SCAN 14 – THE BUS ACCIDENT OF 1962]

Soon a cluster of buildings on the left-hand side marks the Chear Fen Pumping Station which opened in 1842 with a steam beam engine driving a paddle wheel. A new diesel engine was installed in 1926 now replaced by electric pumps like other stations along the river.

Twentypence

Twentypence Bridge carries the road between Wilburton and Cottenham. The origin of the name is uncertain but until about 1907 the river was crossed by a drawbridge almost long enough to span the stream. Perhaps one-shilling and eight-pence may have been the price of its construction or an annual charge for crossing. After this was removed travellers had to shout for the ferryman who lived in the cottage across the road from the public house. As motor traffic increased between Cambridge and Ely councillors debated the construction of a new road to relieve the traffic from A10. Eventually the fen drove from Wilburton was made up and a bridge constructed in 1931

It brought trade to the Bridge Inn where in 1929 the landlord, Mr Savidge had been licensee for over 60 years, having lived in the pub for 80 of his 86 years. It was renamed the Twentypence Inn and extensively remodelled in the 1970s with the addition of a restaurant with a balcony giving a view across the high river bank but has been flattened to make way for houses [SCAN 10 – COMPOSITE VIEW OF THE OLD TWENTYPENCE DROVE AND FERRY, 1929] [SCAN 11 – WORK ON THE NEW TWENTYPENCE BRIDGE 1931]

1937 Floods

There are times however when the boatman has a good view over the banks – and when that happens it is time to worry, for it means that the amount of water in the river has risen to flood levels. One such occasion was Wednesday 17th March 1937 when a combination of rains and tides caused the bank to collapse. Gangs of men rushed to reinforce it with clay and mud but the strength of the current was so great that the first sandbags dropped in the water were tossed about like corks before a foundation was made. Then in the evening wireless calls were broadcast for more volunteers & 200 men responded. The army of workmen filled thousands of sacks and carried them to the top of the bank. This soon became treacherously slippery while the bottom was a veritable quagmire through which men were wading knee deep. Their work proved successful and disaster was averted.

Such incidents are part of the problem of fenland and throughout the centuries various plans have been brought forward to remedy them. [SCAN 24 – THE OLD WEST RIVER NEAR TWENTYPENCE]

Lockspit Hall

The site of ‘Lockspit Hall’ stands on the northern bank. In the 1830s it was a beerhouse kept by William Furbank who operated a ferry across to Smithy Fen, Cottenham. The house did a good trade since baptisms were frequently held in the river. His son Thomas took over the pub when William moved to the Wheatsheaf in Cottenham in 1855. Tragically Thomas’ wife, Alice, was accidentally drowned in December 1883. Nearby are earthworks recording the site of one of the four windpumps that lined the bank from Twentypence, their work superseded by another steam engine further west. [SCAN 13 – THE RIVER AT LOCKSPIT HALL]

Car Dyke

It is here on the southern bank that the Roman-made Car Dyke joined the river. The River system the Romans inherited comprised two great rivers. One was the Cam that ran to Ely and north to March and the sea at Wisbech. But deep in the fens this channel silted up and boats could not get through with the grain so urgently needed for their armies.

There was a second river, the Ouse, which ran through Huntingdon and St Ives to Earith. Here it turned north and continued via Chatteris to join up with the Cam near Wisbech. This section was known as the West Water and continued to run free. So the Romans dug a canal leaving the Cam near Waterbeach and continuing across country to join up with the West Water at Lockspit where a tributary ran towards Earith. But within a century the bank burst at the new junction. The waters of the Ouse, finding an easier channel open to them, ran east down the Old West through the breach and around the Island of Ely till it joined up with the Cam at Little Thetford. At least that is my theory to explain why the Old West runs East.

But the Romans were not the only people to propose grandiose schemes for this section of the river.

Sir Myles Sandys

In the early 1600s when plans for fen drainage were being considered Sir Myles Sandys was a power in the area. King James I was keen to create fertile fields from marshy fenland but faced opposition from the Bishop of Ely and the University of Cambridge. However Sir Myles saw the possibilities of drainage and came up with a scheme for straightening the Old West River by cutting off bends between Lockspit & Twentypence. His plans met with opposition from local folk who claimed the work was impossible and could only be done by witchcraft. But the King backed the one man who was prepared to be positive. Then when visiting the area the James was asked by courtiers to go to a stable where he would hear a cow speak. Inside he found a cow completely wrapped up with only its horn exposed. On it was a large parchment exposing Sandys' scheme as a fraud: he would have benefited by 100 acres of common land and provoked mob violence. The King denounced Sir Myles who like many others were endeavouring to put their own profit before the public good. [SCAN 15 – MAP OF THE OLD WEST SHOWING SIR MYLES SANDY'S PROPOSALS]

Yet these isolated fields have seen more than their share of violent struggle

Soon the river passes beneath one of the most important bridges in the county carrying what for centuries was the main road from Cambridge to Ely.

Aldreth Causeway

Before the fens were drained the Isle of Ely was indeed an island, standing high above the surrounding marsh. It was here that Saint Etheldreda founded a religious community of monks and nuns to worship God in the safety of their inaccessible stronghold. It became a holy site and place of pilgrimage.

There were three main tracks leading to this isolated place, one from Stuntney, one from Earith and this one to Aldreth. Its approach from the south was guarded by an Iron Age fort called Belsar's Hill which featured in various battles, the most famous of which was the struggle between William the Conqueror and Hereward the Wake

Following 1066 William subdued all England, apart from the fens. Various disaffected and dispossessed remnants of the English sought refuge on the island of Ely. They were joined by a troublesome youth named Hereward who had been banished by his family and gained himself a reputation as a fighting man before returning to find his own estates held by Normans..

The Isle of Ely was hard to capture, being completely surrounded by stagnant meres and marshes. William attempted an attack in 1069 but found it impossible to force a passage through the fens, so he left it alone while he sorted out other troublespots. In 1070 he returned to Cambridge where he built a castle while he considered what to do; he constructed forts and tried an assault by constructing a causeway to carry his heavily-armed soldiers over the marshy ground, but failed again.

However if he could not get onto the Island he could get his lands on monastic land, which he divided amongst his own supporters. This upset the monks who were also finding their warlike guests something of a handicap and the siege restricting supplies. They decided to negotiate with the King and their Abbot briefed him on the secret passageways onto the Island. But William was in no hurry. Then in 1071 one of Hereward's leaders was killed in a mutiny and news came that the Scots were coming to add their support. William decided this was time to act. Once more he forced an approach – this time he knew the way and was successful. The defenders were slaughtered in great numbers, many were taken prisoner, their eyes were put out, their hands and feet cut off though Hereward escaped. William fortified the approach with a castle at Aldreth.

Later there were other battles during the civil wars between King Stephen and Queen Matilda when the Bishop's knights were defeated and brought into Ely tied across the backs of their horses. Others followed and from time to time ancient swords and pieces of armour are discovered, reminders of these conflicts. [SCAN 15 and 15A – YOU CHOOSE - THE ALDRETH CAUSEWAY AND THE ISLE OF ELY AS SEEN BY CHARLES HARPER 1901] [SCAN 20 HEReward THWARTS AN ATTACK AS SEEN BY VICTORIAN ARTIST JOHN TITTERTON]

But there was another battle that continued much longer – the battle to maintain a crossing over the river.

Aldreth High Bridge

There is mention of a bridge here in 1279 when it was in bad condition. But this was profitable for the Bishop of Ely who put in a ferry and charged travellers a toll for crossing. It was such an important route that he levied a tax on his tenants throughout the region to raise money for its repair. By 1614 it had fallen down and the ferry was back in action for about 50 years. It was a dangerous crossing, six or seven people lost their lives and cattle dealers stopped selling their animals at Aldreth market. During the Civil War Cromwell fortified the newly rebuilt bridge but by 1765 it had fallen down once more. By then the new road at Stretham had been constructed and traffic along the Aldreth Causeway declined.

But it was not the end. In 1901 Haddenham Parish Council urged the newly-formed County Council to replace the bridge. Their appeal was successful and during rebuilding work an ancient square oak beam some thirty feet long was found in good preservation. But the approaching track was still in poor condition. Some wanted it to be made into a proper road carrying traffic along the traditional route to Cambridge but the Twentypence route was preferred. [SCAN 16 ALDRETH HIGH BRIDGE 2005]

Queenholme

The Old West continues past Queenholme where a part of Willingham parish is now isolated on the north side of the river, proof that its route must have changed. Queenholme Farm was once home to Fred Norman the first fenman to win the Amateur Skating Championship. One of his achievements was to skate around the Isle of Ely in a day. Starting down the Old West River and the Ouse to Denver Sluice and returning on the New Bedford River to Earith and back home.

Beyond Flat Bridge Farm is the land known as the 'Delphs', subject of a bitter dispute in the early 1600s. There is another small drainage engine erected about 1848 and now preserved by a private trust before the river runs alongside the road from Willingham to Earith.

1947 Floods

This was the scene of another battle in 1947 when deep winter snow and a quick thaw saw the Old West River rise to the top of its banks. Lines of sandbags were placed on either side to try and stop it overflowing. But the bank of the Great Ouse burst beyond Earith flooding the fenland on the other side of the Willingham road. Now sandbags had to be placed on that side of the road as well in an attempt to keep the water in the Over fen. All efforts proved ineffective and floods swept across the road, across the Old West which was full from bank to bank and dropped down into the Hillrow fen. As the water rushed across so it wore down the bank which had to be rebuilt once the resulting devastation was over. [SCAN 19 – THE OLD WEST RIVER ALONGSIDE THE WILLINGHAM ROAD] [SCAN 21 – WATER RUSHES ACROSS THE WILLINGHAM ROAD IN MARCH 1947]

Ahead lies the Hermitage Lock first built by Cornelius Vermuyden to stem the waters of the Great Ouse and send them instead down his New Bedford River. It is hard to appreciate that for centuries the wide river beyond ran along our narrow Old West to meet the Cam where we left it at the Fish and Duck. [SCAN 17 – HERMITAGE LOCK. SCAN. Next month Mike Petty continues the journey towards Ely, Littleport and Denver Sluice.

Our Time, October 2005
Peas Hill by Mike Petty –

Peas Hill links Cambridge's Market Hill to Bene't Street. It has seen remarkable changes within the last century, some through fire buy more through the rebuilding of the inter-war period. The 1930s was a decade of tremendous transformation in central Cambridge, never before had there been so much pulling down and building up again. Whole areas of Sidney Street and Bridge Street had been razed and replaced and Peas Hill was to be no exception.

It was also a period of intense inter-council rivalry. The County Council had erected a fine new Shire Hall on Castle Hill and the Corporation wanted to catch up. Back in the 1890s councillors had wanted a new Guildhall which would include a police station and even swimming baths. But the scheme was rejected by ratepayers.

In the 1920s they determined to try again. Their new headquarters would be far larger than the old and extend round into Union Street, a now forgotten name for the northern end of Peas Hill. They set about acquiring adjoining properties and by 1927 had agreed terms with shop owners including Mr Sennitt the butcher, who wanted £3,500 for his site. It was agreed that the tenants would be allowed to continue to use the premises until they were needed for demolition. By 1935 it was really going ahead. The plans were approved and demolition men moved in to remove the nondescript buildings, including the old butcher's shop with living accommodation above. It really was not much of a place.

But as they started to pull it down a remarkable history was revealed. They found huge rats nests with fragments of broken glass, old bottles, large bones and a phial of vermin killer; while in roof the mummified body of a kitten, dry and leathery, was discovered. And there was more: its timbers had once been part of a ship that had sailed the North Sea in the 1400s. Then it had been broken up and the wood passed into the hands of a builder who shaped it into the upper storey of a house, numbering each timber to show where it fitted. They were transported down the Ouse and Cam for sale at Stourbridge Fair where they had been bought, carried to Peas Hill and assembled.

When complete it had a high pitched roof with overhanging upper storeys and was panelled within and plastered without. It was a fine, fashionable half-timbered dwelling. When fashions changed the old house was modernised inside and out. The lower section was brought forward to disguise the fact that the rooms above had juttied out, the old timbers were hidden behind plaster and red tiles nailed to the front, disguised to look like bricks with imitation pointing in black paint. Soon people forgot what the old place had looked like.

More improvements were made inside: a fireplace with Dutch tiles painted in floral designs, some fine Queen Anne woodwork, sliding windows with bottle glass lights. Layers of paint had been applied to ancient oak, panelling gradually covered with wallpaper, the first being a hand-blocked design of the late eighteenth century printed on waste sheets of a Bible.

All this was revealed as work progressed, but it was no longer demolition. It was a careful dismantling with the ancient timbers carefully taken apart and laid aside ready for a new home elsewhere. Reginald Lambeth, who supervised the demolition of the adjacent premises, produced a drawing showing the buildings in Tudor times before these too were removed. Some of the timbers found their way to Long Road, to a home first owned by Councillor E. Savill Peck, an antiquarian and photographer well aware of the need to conserve Cambridge's past, even if it meant taking it piece by piece to Trumpington for safe keeping.

But not all the premises along that side of Peas Hill were that old. One night in November 1836 fire broke out in Marshall and Bell's corn warehouse on the corner of Wheeler Street and some feared the whole of the area would be destroyed. But thanks to the exertions of the Norwich Union fire engine and numerous university students the flames were checked within two hours. There was talk of removing the buildings and replacing them with a Corn Market or Assize Court, but nothing came of it.

Then in May 1904 fire raged again through the corn merchants premises. A patrolling policeman, PC Winter, noticed smoke coming from a small window above the main door at about half-past four in the morning. He aroused the occupants of neighbouring buildings – including Sennitt the butcher – and called for the fire brigade. They faced a formidable fight. The lower floor of the lathe-and-plaster building was occupied by a shop and offices but the two floors above were full of corn, hay, straw and chaff and were quickly blazing fiercely while the street was alive with rats fleeing for their lives.

But there was plenty of water and they managed to save the ground floor and adjacent buildings. These included the domed Cambridge Free Library with its valuable collection of local books and prints, though its windows were bowed by the heat.

Next morning people gathered to stand and stare at the blackened shell and ponder the preservation of the Bell Inn alongside. It had a parrot that used to hang in a cage outside and became quite expert at getting horses to wander off up the street by imitating their drivers' voices.

The old buildings were cleared and replaced by council offices in 1915. Between the stalls and the Bell was a cobbled space used by cheap-jacks and conmen; in 1927 it was turned into a car parking space for council officers, attracting adverse comments from other motorists. It continues to be used by the Mayor. But car parking was a big issue and Peas Hill an obvious place for them to park.

The only problem was that on Saturdays it reeked of the smell of fish and the pump that had played so great a part in fighting the fires was in continuous use to wash out the smelly boxes.

The Fish Market had been moved from Market Hill in 1500s. It dealt in a great variety of salmon, Colchester oysters, mackerel, herrings, sprats, eels, jacks and other fresh-water varieties. It was a lively scene with every stallholder declaring as loudly as possible the merits of his wares. Canny buyers knew that Saturday afternoon was the best time to come shopping for bloaters and kippers were sold off cheap as they could not be kept over the weekend.

But with more and more cars needing parking spaces so the stalls were forced off the street, until even David the bookseller abandoned his Saturday stall in Peas Hill in 1959, moving to his weekday pitch on Market Hill. A one-way system was introduced in 1936 with waiting restrictions of fifteen minutes imposed and in 1973 the entrance to Market Hill was blocked off, drastically reducing traffic.

More changes took place along the west side. Following the Great War King's College decided to build a hostel on the corner of Peas Hill and St Edward's Passage. Once the plans had been drawn up an irregular piece of land occupied by old sheds and wine cellars remained and Lord Keynes, the bursar, realised that by careful planning a theatre could be dropped into the vacant space. Building started 1935 and the theatre plus restaurant opened in 1936. When it came to a name the suggestion of the 'Fishmarket Theatre' was canvassed, but rejected and 'The Arts' became part of Cambridge life.

Not all dramas are acted out on a stage. John Saltmarsh, an eminent Fellow of King's College, recalled that on part of the Arts and hidden behind a more modern front was a tall old house with a curious cruciform tiled roof and a picturesque gable with carved wooden ornaments. It had been the scene of tragedy. Frances the daughter of Samuel Spalding, town-clerk of Cambridge, wandered into a garret in a remote part of what was then the family's home. The door slammed behind her and she could not escape. Her parents searched frantically but failed to find her and she starved to death. "One of the attics in No.6 has an evil reputation still, and ghostly fingers are sometimes heard to tap on the window", he recorded in 1935

Nearby stands a reminder of the ancient buildings that have been lost. Now home to the Cheltenham and Gloucester Building Society it had in 1935 been The Sugar and Spice coffee house and was formerly two separate cottages. The Cambridge Antiquarian Society's photographic survey includes a photograph taken in 1935 as demolition removed the adjoining premises, a roomy rambling building built around a massive chimneystack, that was once home to Shrivess basketmakers, where clothesbaskets and wicker children's' chairs used to hang outside their shop.

Next door was Fletcher's the butcher's, a building on three floors with low mean rooms above the shop, arranged round a central winding staircase. By 1935 it has been derelict for many years; the condition had to be seen to be believed, and the seeing was attended with some personal risk, Saltmarsh commented. After rebuilding it became the new home to F.O. Sennitt, the butcher, egg and poultry dealer who had supplied butter in yard-long strips to the colleges who sold it on to undergraduates at a penny an inch. They added a fish side to the business and in April 1951 invested in one of the new refrigerated display cabinets avoiding the swarms of flies that had been so much a feature of the area in previous years.

The building on the corner of St Edward's Passage had been Coulson's draper's shop which was badly damaged by fire in December 1900. Despite the efforts of Captain Greef and the Fire Brigade the flames were not extinguished until the entire stock of goods in the shop had been completely destroyed & the front of the shop badly damaged. The cause of the fire was blamed on the overturning of one of the incandescent burners in the shop window. Later, after rebuilding, it was occupied by G.P. Reece a sports shop with a wide range of Automodels equipment on ground floor. It was established mid 1950s to serve children from age of 10 to manhood with a wide range of creative toys, fishing rods and air rifles.

St Edward's church has stood on the site since about 1200. Two side aisles projecting out into the churchyard belong to two colleges & are reminders of two other churches, long removed. One dedicated to St John the Baptist had been demolished for King's College chapel. Clare & Trinity Halls had used it before their own chapels were completed, and they'd buried their dead in the graveyard. They didn't actually have much use for it by then, but on the other hand felt they deserved some compensation for its loss. So Trinity Hall negotiated with the King and was granted the living of St Edward's church, with which the old parish was amalgamated, and both colleges built their own aisles.

But by the 1850s it was in a dangerous state. The north pier of the Chancel arch had started to sink many years before and despite attempts to tie it together with iron bars and buttresses it was continuing to fracture. The walls, columns and piers were so much out of upright, and dragging different ways, that the roof itself seemed about ready to collapse. Inside it was dark, the windows small and partially blocked by a reredos. The Chancel was filled with box pews that were dilapidated and discreditable, uncouth and lumbering, all heights and sizes, some old and some new, all disgraceful. The whole impression was one of damp and cold, ruin and decay. One of the columns supporting the Organ Gallery had gone and it was resting on a coffin which had crumbled into dust. The flooring was very old and as the floorboards creaked apart one became aware of the vaults and old graves beneath. Conditions were so bad that it was felt the whole church might collapse.

Instead it was restored and continues to welcome worshippers; an unusual feature are its two pulpits from the older of which preached Hugh Latimer, Thomas Bilney and Robert Barnes, all of whom were burnt at the stake for their beliefs. The pulpit had been removed in 1858 and stood in a side chapel of King's College until restored to the church in 1949.

Below Peas Hill run an extensive range of tunnels once used at wine vaults. During the war they were wired for electricity and fitted out as air raid shelters. On one afternoon 250 people took shelter there. One lady recalled that you entered through double wooden doors that were overhung by the fig tree in St Edward's churchyard. When a bomb exploded over Jordan's Yard all the hard figs off the tree showered down like machine-gun bullets

But redevelopment in Peas Hill was not confined to the 1930s. Great controversy surrounded the redevelopment of the Central Hotel on the other side of St Edward's church.

It was a listed building with the date 1729 visible on rainwater heads, but was much older. It boasted some large picturesque oak doors and beams and three big old fireplaces bearing carved Tudor roses together with tiles, some of which had been removed as souvenirs by visitors. Oliver Cromwell was said to have visited and Samuel Pepys knew it as the Three Tuns where he drank pretty hard. It was later bought by the Cambridge University & Town Coffee Palace Company set up on temperance lines to supply the needs of workmen, cabmen, market gardeners, artisans and others in an effort to attract custom from the gin palaces and public houses.

Despite protests it was demolished in 1959 to be replaced by another hostel for King's College, its modern architecture contrasting with that of the 1930s buildings around it. As the old inn was pulled down more mysteries were revealed. One room could only be reached by climbing through a small window and going along the roof. It was thought to have been the hiding place of a priest. Another may have been a concert chamber for adjoining it on a higher level was another room where the minstrels played. There was another bizarre discovery: half way up a chimney was discovered a lady's crinoline. What caused her to leave such a garment behind?

The Great Ouse to Ely, by Mike Petty; Our Time October 2005

Mike Petty continues his exploration of the River Great Ouse

The Cam joins the Old West beside the isolated Fish and Duck public house and together they flow towards Ely. Here in this lonely spot there was once a lake, Harrimere, that attracted wildfowl, a chapel to pray for a safe crossing and later a tollhouse to extract money from barges to maintain the banks keeping the fens safe from flood. [SCAN 100.05 VIEW TOWARDS ELY FROM THE JUNCTION OF THE OLD WEST AND THE CAM]

Two hamlets face each other on opposite sides of the river. One is Little Thetford, the other Barway. Both are off the beaten track.

Little Thetford is approached from the main A10 Cambridge to Ely Road. Previously a small farming community it has seen major housing growth within the last decade. In its centre is a curious round house that in 1901 consisted of two tenements lived in by two separate families. It may have once been the base of a windmill or a dovecote but during the Second World War it became the village's designated First Aid centre. The church of St George still attracts its Sunday congregations. [SCAN 5662 THE ROUND HOUSE AT LT THETFORD c1900]

Barway is a yet more isolated community reached down a minor turning off the Ely to Soham road. Its church no longer welcomes worshippers. It has suffered over the centuries; in 1602 it was 'ruined for want of tiling and glazing and the churchyard walls down' and the village itself 'a verie fowell countre and waterye and especialye in the winter season'. By the early 1800s the church was roofless and the pulpit swimming in a pond. It reopened in 1819 after being completely repaired but in 1972, having stood unused for ten years, came plans to convert it into a house in which capacity it still stands. [SCAN 8681 BARWAY 1930's]

A ferry used to ply across the Ouse, linking the two hamlets. But several centuries before there had been another connection. In 1932 a Barway farmer noticed that his plough kept hitting some buried posts. He investigated and found a forest of stakes embedded in the clay forming an ancient causeway crossing the fen from his Fordy Farm towards Little Thetford. Historians wondered whether it might have been constructed by William the Conqueror while attempting to force his way onto the Island of Ely defended by Hereward the Wake. But when archaeologists investigated they found that the causeway was far earlier and dated back to the Bronze Age.

Within the last few weeks a new route has been opened to Barway in the form of a cyclepath from Ely along the top of the riverbank and alongside Soham Lode. This now little-used stream was once a major trading route carrying barges to Soham. It has been the site of various battles.

Until 1917 the waters of the lode were lifted into the Great Ouse by a giant windpump. Its replacement was put to the test two years later when in February 1919 a rapid thaw of snow & rain caused problems throughout the area. Farmers began to remove their stock to safety while men worked all night to try and prevent disaster. At Barway they sank a barge to try and strengthen the bank but without success and it collapsed causing major flooding.

It was a situation repeated during the terrible floods of March 1937 when Soham Lode once more burst its banks 50 yards from Barway. The danger had been foreseen: all stock had been moved to safety and families in the fen were evacuated into the village. Loads of clay were rushed to the scene and once more workmen laboured for hours by the light of hurricane lamps to try and rebuilt the top of the bank. Their labours came to nothing when the bottom of the bank burst. By morning over 1,000 acres were under water and Barway was almost completely cut off. There were fears that the sluice gates at the Ouse end of the Soham Lode would collapse so men from RAF Mildenhall constructed a temporary dam. Then in February

1939 it happened all over again; the bank burst once more and 400 acres were flooded. Now the outfall is regulated by new structure containing a large electric pump. [SCAN 10184 THE BARWAY WINDPUMP CONTRASTED WITH THE MODERN REPLACEMENT – PETTY1]

Opposite, on the Little Thetford side, a much smaller electric pump house incorporates the foundation stone of its predecessor, a steam engine originally erected in 1845. From it there is a fine prospect of Ely Cathedral as the river makes its way north [SCAN PETTY 2 – VIEW TO ELY FROM BANK NEAR LITTLE THETFORD SEPT 2005]

The footpath along the riverbank suddenly takes a diversion to run alongside a reedy ditch. A narrow-boat nestling alongside its bank gives a hint of its importance. For this stream leads to Braham Dock. Today it is a tranquil area of trees and water but the fields contain a defensive earthwork, hinting of a turbulent past. This was once a port where goods would be unloaded from sea-going boats swept into the fens on the tide. This was as near as boats could get to Ely from the south for the natural channel of the River Ouse swung away run under the slopes of Stuntney Hill. In the middle of the 1100's an artificial cut was made to take the river into Ely and Braham's period of importance faded away. [SCAN PETTY 3 – THE APPROACH TO BRAHAM DOCK, 2005]

Soon river is crossed by the railway track to Bury St Edmunds, it was this line that carried the ill-fated ammunition train that was to explode at Soham station in June 1944. The opening of the main line from Cambridge to Ely and beyond in 1845 meant goods could be transported far quicker and in greater quantity than before. A dock was constructed between rail and river so that coal could be transferred from train to barge for delivery to pumping stations.

Today it is the road that carries the essentials of life with numerous articulated lorries queuing at the busy railway crossing near Ely station, often preventing smaller vehicles from using the underpass beneath the track. This itself is often blocked when too-high vehicles think they can get under, only to become wedged. The solution must be a bypass but this presents technical problems.

Not only must it cross the railway track and the river but it must also traverse the area of fenland between Ely and Stuntney, soil which provides very little support for roads. It has always been a difficult area to cross. King Canute managed to pick his way over the partially-frozen flooded fenland by employing a fat fenman named Pudden to act as his guide; if the ice bore him, it would bear the king! Later a causeway was constructed about 1200 and maintained by the monastery who charged a toll on those who used it.

Despite constant repair it was never an easy route. Celia Fiennes who crossed in 1698 lamented; "In winter this Causey is over flowed and they have no way but boates to pass in". By the 19th century the road was worn down to the black earth and there were dangerous ruts and holes. It has remained a challenge to generations of road engineers who used new technology to ensure a long-lasting surface when the present Stuntney bypass was completed in December 1986. [SCAN 7602 VIEW FROM STUNTNEY ALONG THE CAUSEWAY TO ELY 1920's]

The traveller still has to cross the Ouse. There was a bridge by 1250 but it was in poor condition; in 1681 a visitor complained of crossing a 'rotten bridge with our horses, being glad to alight for fear they should break through and stick in the rotten bogs under then'. There were a series of wooden bridges until a handsome stone structure was opened in 1833; it was replaced by an steel bridge in 1910 that in turn gave way to the present one in 1982 [SCAN 6540 – THE 1833 BRIDGE]

The railway bridge beyond was the scene of excitement in May 1922 when a large number of wooden sleepers caught fire after hot cinders fell from a passing locomotive. Soon flames were rising seven feet into the air and showering sparks down on to boats passing beneath. Realising that a train was due a young man attacked the blaze with pails of water. [SCAN 9850 ELY FROM THE RAILWAY BRIDGE, 1880's]

Now the Ouse reaches Annesdale and the old commercial heartland of the city. It is an area that has undergone dramatic transformation within the last 40 years with many of the old commercial buildings consigned to history & replaced by new houses. Yet history shows that houses here have frequently been flooded in the past. [SCAN 86.469 FLOODING NEAR THE CUTTER]

One old building to have survived is the former Maltings built in 1868. It was badly damaged by fire & sold for £100 to Ely council on condition it be turned into a public hall. The proposal proved controversial but it was finally opened in its new role by the Secretary of State for the Environment Mr Peter Walker in October 1971. The nearby Ely brewery of Hall, Cutlack and Harlock had their workshops on Waterside but closed suddenly in January 1969 when some 300 employees found their jobs in Ely had gone. Other old buildings have been converted into an antiques warehouse and an arts centre.

It used to be said that on a damp November morning the Ely riverside area had an atmosphere of its own. When stink of the river mingled with the pong from the brewery, Sugar Beet Factory and Gas Works and then combined with the reek from the sewage works it produced a cocktail that was far from pleasant. No wonder the maggots from the nearby rag-and-bone works would crawl out holding their noses!

Now the area has been transformed by the creation of a park complete with bandstand. This site was excavated in a televised 'Time Team' dig which identified inlets in which barges would have offloaded their cargo. This would not have been news to John Titterton, an Ely artist of a century ago, for he depicted them in the background of a painting of the construction of the Cathedral which dominates the city.

Today tourists saunter where men and women once sat making baskets and eel traps. In the 1870s there were about 40 basketmakers living in Ely, The trade had largely died out by 1938 though Sam Cox and Jack Hills continued until the 1960s. The willow was grown on Babylon, on the other side of the river. [SCAN 7520 UNLOADING WILLOWS AT ELY, 1880's] Here there were a number of quaint cottages, their picturesque appearance belying the damp conditions inside that became much worse when flooding forced residents to move upstairs. This was the boat-building area for centuries and home to Appleyard-Lincoln's 'Elysian' craft, now it is a marina [SCAN 327 AERIAL PHOTO SHOWING RIVERSIDE AREA OF ELY 1983]

The Cutter is the sole survivor of the inns that served the area. It was licenced in the 1830s to cater for the increasing river trade but by 1841 was dilapidated and put up for sale. The new owners added a skittle alley and trade revived. After modernisation in 1964 it was reopened by Stewart Morris, a former Olympic sailing gold medallist who had known it since the 1930s when he practised on the Ouse as a member of the Cambridge University Sailing Club. University rowers also use the river for practising and in 1944 an unofficial Oxford and Cambridge Boat Race was contested near Queen Adelaide, an event recreated 50 years later.

From here groups continue to enjoy river excursions as they have for generations. One of the popular boats was the Pattie which in 1916 had a more unusual role: that of aircraft carrier. A military plane came down between the Bedford Rivers and she was sent to bring it back to Ely. Now pleasure craft moor alongside the quay and large crowds flock for the Aquafest water carnival in July. [SCAN 332 THE ELY AQUAFEST 1986]

The river wends its way under another railway bridge and on towards Roswell pits where for centuries a particularly type of sticky clay known as gault has been extracted to maintain the river banks so essential to the survival of the fenland. At its entrance stood the old Cuckoo Bridge across which ran the track to Turbutsey, the northern port area in medieval times. Nearby the Overfall Mill pumped water from the Middle Fen into the river until it was demolished in 1917. [SCAN 10306 – CUCKOO BRIDGE 1899]

Once windpumps had been superseded by more powerful steam and diesel pumps the fen land was able to grow remarkable quantities of food. One new crop introduced in the 1920s was sugar beet. It needed factories to process it and one of the first was at Ely. It made a major impact on the local economy providing comparatively well-paid work for local people at a time of hardship. The new factory had a riverside frontage with unloading berths for 30 factory-owned barges that would collect the beet from riverside fields and be towed by tug to the quayside where electric overhead cranes would empty them. Coal was brought by rail which took away the resultant sugar, molasses and pulp used as animal feed. [SCAN 8906 ELY SUGAR BEET FACTORY BARGES]

A challenge to both rail and river came from lorries which frequently found themselves held up by the numerous railway crossings at Queen Adelaide.

There was another problem: during the processing mud from the beet was washed into the river. By December 1928 it was clogging up the river so badly that tugs had difficulty getting through. The water was being held up causing a serious danger of flooding while the whole of the river between Ely and Denver Sluice had a thin coating of slime all over it and was the consistency of a mud-pie.

As sugar beet became established so the 50,000 tons of the first campaign grew more than fivefold in 25 years. During the campaign season, from September to January the factory worked round-the-clock, seven days a week until it closed in 1981. Now it is just a memory and farmers are concerned that the crop itself may pass into history.

Ahead lies the ruler-straight river towards Littleport – which will be explored in next month's Our Time
